EDITOR'S NOTE

In 2001-2002, the Cox Center at Case Western Reserve School of Law initiated a multi-year symposium focusing on international crimes against women. Published in this issue of the Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law are the lectures given during the first year of this symposium. Additional articles on this topic will be published in a forthcoming book, due for publication in 2004.

This issue is the result of the combined publishing efforts of two editorial boards. I would like to thank both editorial boards for their hard work and enthusiasm throughout this process. I also would like to thank Alice Simon and Nancy Pratt Kantor for their help in organizing the publishing effort. Additionally, I would like to thank Dean Hiram Chodosh for his guidance and vision. Finally, special thanks is owed to our subscribers and contributing authors for their patience in this process.
