* This article was completed in February 1993, but repeated publication delays in finalizing this issue of the Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law have prevented dissemination until now. Throughout the last year, there have been advances with respect to Integrated Resources Planning ("IRP") and energy development in the United States, and in many of the nations discussed herein. As a result, some of the materials cited, especially certain facts and figures, need updating. Unfortunately, given the lack of time provided prior to the final publication date, major revisions to this work were not possible.

The authors are hopeful that even in the absence of a revision, this work achieves its main goals: (1) to describe IRP and its advantages as an energy planning and development tool; (2) to provide an overview of energy and environmental concerns in the developing world; (3) to illustrate, through the use of two Eastern European case studies, the potential usefulness of IRP; and (4) to urge institutions such as the World Bank and the U.S. Agency for International Development to take a closer look at IRP, and perhaps incorporate the process into their on-going lending efforts.

The authors gratefully acknowledge the assistance of Steven Johnson, Gerald Brooks, Candace Somers, and Mark Gordon with the preparation of this paper.
