King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

Jonathan H. Adler
Michael F. Cannon

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarlycommons.law.case.edu/faculty_publications
Part of the Law Commons

Repository Citation
https://scholarlycommons.law.case.edu/faculty_publications/1658

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Scholarly Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Publications by an authorized administrator of Scholarly Commons.
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

Jonathan H. Adler and Michael F. Cannon*

I am altering the deal. Pray I don’t alter it any further.¹

Introduction

King v. Burwell presented the question of whether the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010 (ACA) authorizes the Internal Revenue Service to issue tax credits for the purchase of health insurance through exchanges established by the federal government. The King plaintiffs alleged an IRS rule purporting to authorize tax credits in federal exchanges was unlawful because the text of the ACA expressly authorizes tax credits only in exchanges “established by the State.” Led by Chief Justice John Roberts, the Supreme Court conceded the plain meaning of the operative text, and that Congress defined “State” to exclude the federal government. The Court nevertheless disagreed with the plaintiffs, explaining that “the context and structure of the Act compel us to depart from what would otherwise be the most natural reading of the pertinent statutory phrase.”² Voting 6–3, the Court effectively rewrote the

* Adler is the Johan Verheij Memorial Professor of Law and director of the Center for Business Law & Regulation at the Case Western Reserve University School of Law. Cannon is director of health policy studies at the Cato Institute. The authors were intimately involved in King v. Burwell and related litigation. They were the first to publicly question the lawfulness of the disputed IRS rule, developed many of the legal arguments raised in the resulting legal challenges, and filed multiple amicus curiae briefs in King and related cases. The authors thank Andrew Peterson for his research assistance.

¹ Star Wars: Episode V - The Empire Strikes Back (Lucasfilm 1980).

statutory text in order to ensure the ACA would “improve health insurance markets, not . . . destroy them.”

King was the Supreme Court’s third ACA case in four years. In 2012, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the act in National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, but only after rejecting a Commerce Clause justification for the individual mandate (construing it instead to be a use of the taxing power) and eliminating the requirement that states must implement the ACA’s Medicaid expansion in order to keep receiving federal Medicaid grants. Then, in 2014, in Hobby Lobby Stores v. Burwell, the Court concluded the Obama administration had failed to accommodate religious objections to the so-called “contraception mandate” as required under the federal Religious Freedom Restoration Act.

NFIB saved the ACA, but left the statute scarred. Hobby Lobby rebuked the Department of Health and Human Services’ implementation of the new law. By comparison, 2015’s King v. Burwell was a resounding victory for the Obama administration. This third trip to One First Street was the charm.

While portions of the Court’s King opinion may constrain agency interpretive authority in future cases, the opinion green-lighted the administration’s efforts to implement the ACA without regard for the limitations contained in the ACA’s text. Even if the Court did not accept the specific arguments offered by the solicitor general, it gave the Obama administration nearly everything it wanted. The Court expanded the ACA beyond what its congressional supporters ever had the votes to enact. It just had to disregard portions of the ACA’s text and selectively consider statutory structure and context to do it.

3 Id. at 2496.
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

This article proceeds as follows. Part I demonstrates, via the ACA’s unique legislative history, how having states operate the law’s exchanges was an indispensable purpose of the act. The ACA literally would not have become law if the federal government were given primary responsibility for operating exchanges. Part II explains how the statutory language at issue in King is clear, unambiguous, and serves that congressional purpose—even if some ACA supporters did not know about or approve of that language. Part III discusses how and why the IRS departed from the plain meaning of that language, and the academic and legal challenges that followed. Part IV gives an overview of the Supreme Court’s King decision. Part V shows how the majority misused statutory context to find the ACA is ambiguous. Part VI shows the Court’s claim that it is “implausible” that Congress intended that language is demonstrably false. Part VII discusses the significance of the Court’s decision not to apply the Chevron deference-to-agencies doctrine in King. Part VIII connects Chief Justice Roberts’s approach to King to his “saving constructions” in NFIB v. Sebelius, which together have produced a law that is now materially different from Congress’s plan. Part IX offers concluding thoughts.

I. State-Run Exchanges: An Essential Part of Congress’s Plan

After 100 years marked by more failures than successes, advocates of universal health insurance coverage were heartened when a wave election in 2008 gave Democrats control of the presidency and both chambers of Congress. Crucially, one Republican senator’s subsequent party switch also gave Democrats a 60-seat, filibuster-proof majority in the U.S. Senate that lasted from July 2009 until January 2010.7 The House passed its health care bill in November 2009.8 The Senate followed suit, passing the ACA—the merged product of health care bills passed by the Senate Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions (HELP) Committee and the Senate Finance Committee—on December 24, 2009. The ACA passed the Senate by a vote of 60–39, overcoming a GOP filibuster without a vote to spare.

---

The ACA’s authors never intended it to become the final bill. Their goal was simply to marshal 60 votes behind something they could later merge with the House bill. A special-election upset put an end to such hopes. In January 2010, Massachusetts voters elected Republican Scott Brown to fill the Senate seat vacated by the death of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-MA). Brown’s victory put an end to the Senate Democrats’ filibuster-proof majority. At that moment, the ACA became the only health care bill that could become law, because neither a House-Senate compromise nor any other bill could overcome a GOP filibuster.

Whatever the ACA’s shortcomings, if Democrats wanted comprehensive health care legislation, it would have to be the ACA, because voters had blocked them from enacting anything more expansive. Despite serious reservations, House Democrats approved the ACA as-is, making only minor changes through the budget reconciliation process, and sent it to the president’s desk. One of those reservations would prove significant.

The ACA employed the basic framework House and Senate Democrats had agreed upon before the legislative process began: Medicaid coverage for everyone below a given poverty threshold and heavily regulated private health insurance for everyone else. The latter regulations banned discrimination on the basis of pre-existing conditions, and then, to combat the resulting instability, both required individuals to obtain coverage (an individual mandate) and subsidized premiums for low- and moderate-income households. Economists liken this scheme to a three-legged stool because it has the quality that without each of those three elements in place, the scheme collapses.

9 Timothy S. Jost, Yes, the Federal Exchange Can Offer Premium Tax Credits, Health Reform Watch Blog (Sept. 11, 2011), http://www.healthreformwatch.com/2011/09/11/yes-the-federal-exchange-can-offer-premium-tax-credits (“No one intended the current ACA to become the final law. It was the Senate bill, enacted after the House bill, which was to go through conference before the final [bill] was enacted.”).

King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

The ACA differed from the House bill in at least one significant respect: it gave states primary responsibility for administering its health-insurance “Exchanges,” allowing the federal government to operate exchanges only where states failed to do so themselves. The House bill created a single, nationwide exchange administered by the federal government.

Whatever substantive reasons individual Senate Democrats may have had for preferring state-run exchanges—for example, local control, deflecting criticisms that the ACA was a federal takeover of health care—what matters for our present purposes is that state-run exchanges were an absolute political necessity. Key Democratic senators threatened not to support a final bill unless states operated the exchanges. All other ACA supporters had no choice but to relent. Defeating a GOP filibuster required 60 votes, and Senate 11 See U.S. Rep. Doggett: Settling for Second-Rate Health Care Doesn’t Serve Texans, My Harlingen News (Jan. 11, 2010), http://www.myharlingennews.com/?p=6426 (letter from 11 House Democrats to President Obama and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi expressing concern about the ACA and “states with indifferent state leadership that are unwilling or unable to administer and properly regulate a health insurance marketplace”); see also Terry Gross, Next Up: Turning Two Health Care Bills into One, Fresh Air (WBUR News) (Jan. 12, 2010), http://www.wbur.org/npr/122483567 (“GROSS: So getting to the exchanges, in the House bill, it’s a national insurance exchange. In the Senate bill, it’s state-oriented . . . Mr. COHN: Absolutely, and this is a very important difference that frankly has gotten little attention.”). See also Julie Rovner, House, Senate View Health Exchanges Differently, NPR (Jan. 12, 2010), http://www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=122476051.

12 Senate Democratic Policy Comm., Fact Check: Responding to Opponents of Health Insurance Reform (Sept. 21, 2009), http://dpc.senate.gov/reform/reform-factcheck-092109.pdf (“There is no government takeover or control of health care in any senate health insurance reform legislation . . . . All the health insurance exchanges, which will create choice and competition for Americans’ business in health care, are run by states” (emphasis added)).

13 On the Record (Fox News broadcast, Apr. 13, 2010), http://www.foxnews.com/story/2010/04/14/sen-ben-nelson-his-side-cornhusker-kickback.html (“I had requirements. The requirements were no government run plan, no federal exchange, national exchange, and adequate language to deal with abortion. Those were requirements.”). See also Patrick O’Connor & Carrie Brown, Nancy Pelosi’s Uphill Health Bill Battle, Politico, Jan. 9, 2010 (“Two key moderates—Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.)—have favored the state-based exchanges over national exchanges.”); Reed Abelson, Proposals Clash on States’ Roles in Health Plans, N.Y. Times, Jan. 13, 2010 (“Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, is a former governor, state insurance commissioner and insurance executive who strongly favors the state approach. His support is considered critical to the passage of any health care bill.”).
Democrats had no votes to spare. Following Scott Brown’s election, no other bill could have cleared Congress. The ACA would not have passed without a system of state-run exchanges. This was not only a distinct part of Congress’s plan, but indeed a sine qua non of the ACA.

This congressional purpose was neither hidden nor its existence in dispute. Democrats in both chambers emphasized the ACA’s exchanges would be state-run. They scarcely mentioned the possibility of federal exchanges. Shortly after enactment, HHS Secretary Kathleen Sebelius testified, “I think it will very much be a State-based program.” President Obama predicted, “by 2014, each state will set up what we’re calling a health insurance exchange.” They did not foresee that 34 states would refuse.

II. Clear Language that Serves a Congressional Purpose

The ACA’s text reflects Congress’s preference for state-run exchanges. Section 1311 directs, “Each State shall . . . establish an . . . Exchange.” Like the Finance and HELP bills, the ACA authorized unlimited start-up funds for state-run exchanges. To provide an incentive for states to establish exchanges, it conditioned renewal of those grants on states making progress toward establishing an exchange and implementing other parts of the act. Like the Finance and HELP bills, it provided no start-up funding for federal exchanges.

14 See Adler & Cannon, supra note 7, at 148–50 (reviewing discussion of exchanges in the Congressional Record).
15 Departments of Labor, Health & Human Services, Education, & Related Agencies Appropriations for 2011: Hearing Before a Subcomm. on Appropriations, House of Representatives, 111th Cong. 171 (Apr. 21, 2010) (statement of Kathleen Sebelius, Sec’y, Dep’t of Health & Hum. Servs.).
18 Id. § 18031(a).
19 Id.
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

The statutory language at issue in King likewise serves Congress’s purpose of encouraging states to establish exchanges. Section 1401 of the ACA created a new Internal Revenue Code Section 36B, which authorizes refundable “premium-assistance tax credits” for “applicable taxpayers” who meet certain criteria. One criterion is that recipients enroll in coverage “through an Exchange established by the State under section 1311 of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act.”

Notably, Section 36B’s tax-credit eligibility rules bear no mention of exchanges established by the federal government. Indeed, “established by the State under Section 1311” twice distinguishes state-established exchanges from federal exchanges, authority for which appears in Section 1321. The eligibility rules contain no language broadly authorizing credits through “an[y]” exchange, as the ACA does with small-business tax credits. Instead, Section 36B’s tax-credit eligibility rules are tightly, even artfully worded. Every reference to exchanges is to “an Exchange established by the State under section 1311.” That requirement appears twice explicitly and seven more times by cross-reference. Section 36B plainly authorizes tax credits solely through state-established exchanges, a condition that serves Congress’s purpose of encouraging state-run exchanges by creating an incentive for states to establish them.

small, given that it is ushering in a series of new regulations covering a sector that accounts for a major chunk of the American economy. It only appropriates $1 billion for all federal administrative costs. ‘Everyone expects that billion dollars not to be adequate,’ said Edwin Park of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities[.].” In other words, (1) the ACA became law with zero funding for federal exchanges, (2) Congress only later added a general implementation fund that could be used for federal exchanges, but (3) that fund was insufficient to fund responsibilities HHS was expected to undertake, much less federal exchanges.

22 PPACA § 1321(c); 42 U.S.C. § 18041(c).
23 PPACA § 1421(b)(1); 26 U.S.C. § 45R(a)(1).
25 Congressional Research Service, Legal Analysis of Availability of Premium Tax Credits in State and Federally Created Exchanges Pursuant to the Affordable Care Act, Congressional Distribution Memorandum (Jul. 23, 2012) (“[A] strictly textual analysis of the plain meaning of the provision would likely lead to the conclusion that the IRS’s authority to issue the premium tax credits is limited only to situations in which the taxpayer is enrolled in a state-established exchange.”).
The broader context of the ACA supports the plain meaning of Section 36B. As noted above, Section 1311 creates a parallel financial incentive for states to establish exchanges.\textsuperscript{26} The act explicitly defines the District of Columbia as a “State,” bringing a D.C.-established exchange within the meaning of “an Exchange established by the State.”\textsuperscript{27} It explicitly treats any U.S. territory that establishes a compliant exchange as a “State.”\textsuperscript{28} The House and HELP bills contained language explicitly creating full equivalence between exchanges established by states and those established by HHS.\textsuperscript{29} Yet Congress rejected those bills in favor of the ACA, which includes no language defining federal exchanges as having been “established by the State,” or otherwise making federal exchanges equivalent to state-established exchanges for purposes of Section 36B.

Remarkably, there is no discussion of the status of tax credits in federal exchanges in the \textit{Congressional Record}, contemporaneous media reports, or known communications among the ACA’s drafters and supporters. The only exception of which we are aware supports the plain meaning of Section 36B. In January 2010, all 11 House Democrats from Texas complained that, as in other federal programs that condition benefits on state cooperation, residents of states that fail to establish exchanges would not receive “any benefit” from the ACA, and “will be left no better off than before Congress acted.”\textsuperscript{30}

There are several reasons for the lack of publicly available contemporaneous discussion of this issue.\textsuperscript{31} Due to the ACA’s peculiar his-

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{26} 42 U.S.C. § 18031(a).
\item \textsuperscript{27} 42 U.S.C. § 18024(d).
\item \textsuperscript{28} 42 U.S.C. § 18043(a)(1).
\item \textsuperscript{29} See Adler & Cannon, \textit{supra} note 7, at 158–59.
\item \textsuperscript{30} See \textit{supra} note 11.
\item \textsuperscript{31} Contemporaneous emails, notes, memoranda, and other documents generated by the ACA’s drafters, legislative counsel, and House negotiators in 2009 and 2010 presumably would include at least some discussion of this issue. Unfortunately, congressional Democrats have not made those records available, and the individuals responsible for drafting 36B have not discussed the issue publicly. See Robert Pear, Four Words That Imperil Health Care Law Were All a Mistake, Writers Now Say, N.Y. Times, May 25, 2015, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2015/05/26/us/politics/contested-words-in-affordable-care-act-may-have-been-left-by-mistake.html (“The words were written by professional drafters—skilled nonpartisan lawyers—from the office of the Senate legislative counsel, then James W. Fransen . . . The language of the Finance Committee bill was written largely by Mr. Fransen and a tax expert, Mark J. Mathiesen."

42
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

tory, there was never a conference report. “Congress wrote key parts of the Act behind closed doors,” the King majority wrote, “rather than through the traditional legislative process.” The public debate was dominated by hot-button issues like a “public option” and abortion funding. A general consensus that all states would establish exchanges made this restriction uninteresting. The fact that nobody expected the ACA to become the final law made it unimportant.

Nevertheless, the limited legislative history that exists suggests this feature was deliberate. The “established by the State” requirement originated in the first draft of the Senate Finance Committee’s bill, appearing once explicitly and five more times by cross-reference. It survived multiple revisions throughout the drafting process, including revisions to the adjacent cross-reference. There is no evidence whatsoever that Senate Democrats even considered altering the meaning of that requirement. Instead, under the supervision of Senate leaders and White House officials, drafters inserted additional mentions of this requirement—a second explicit mention and two more cross-references to it—shortly before the ACA went to the Senate floor.

. . . Mr. Fransen did not respond to a message seeking comment, and other attempts to reach him were not successful.” Note that this passage contradicts the article’s title; Section 36B’s writers did not comment.)

32 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2492 (internal quotation marks omitted).

33 See Gross, supra note 11 (noting that exchanges were “not a hot-button issue like abortion or the public option.”).

34 Compare, e.g., S. 1796, 111th Cong. (2009), § 1205, proposing 26 U.S.C. § 36B(b)(2)(A)(i) (“and which were enrolled in through an exchange established by the State under subpart B of title XXII of the Social Security Act” (emphasis added)), with PPACA § 1401, creating 26 U.S.C. § 36B(b)(2)(A) (“and which were enrolled in through an Exchange established by the State under [section] 1311 of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act” (emphasis added)).

Other legislation proposed by the ACA’s authors contained similar provisions. The HELP bill—as the government and its amici conceded—created the same three-legged stool yet conditioned exchange subsidies on states implementing that bill’s employer mandate. Those who drafted and supported this bill were willing to cut off exchange subsidies in intransigent states.

As this history indicates, ACA supporters actively considered conditioning tax credits on state cooperation, and were willing to tolerate the instability that would result from imposing community-rating price controls without offering premium subsidies, in order to serve their purpose of getting states to implement the new federal program.

III. The Road to King

Government officials and independent analysts were aware of Section 36B’s limitations on tax-credit eligibility when constitutional challenges to the act were still before lower courts. In late 2010, employee-benefits attorney Thomas Christina made a presentation at the American Enterprise Institute highlighting the fact that the ACA authorizes tax credits for those who enroll “through an Exchange established by the State under section 1311,” but not for those who enroll through federal exchanges. One of us heard Christina’s presentation in early 2011 while researching federal-state relations under the ACA versus other approaches to “cooperative federalism.” The resulting paper, discussing the limitation on tax credits in Section 37 Thomas Christina, What to Look for Beyond the Individual Mandate (And How to Look for It), Am. Enter. Inst. (Dec. 6, 2010).

King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

1401 among other aspects of the ACA, was presented at a health law conference that spring.38 None of the numerous health law experts and government officials in attendance, including the Kansas Insurance Commissioner,39 raised any objection to the plain-meaning interpretation of Section 36B.

According to a later congressional investigation, a Treasury official overseeing ACA implementation became aware of this feature of the act in March 2011 via media coverage of Christina’s presentation.40 This discovery concerned IRS officials. Soon thereafter, the IRS dropped the statutory requirement that tax-credit recipients must enroll “through an Exchange established by the State” from their draft regulations.41

The IRS’s decision to focus more closely on this question was no doubt motivated by growing resistance to ACA implementation in dozens of states.42 A wave election in 2010 swept into office many state governors and legislators opposed to implementing the law.43 If states could block tax credits by refusing to establish exchanges, they could expose the full cost of exchange coverage to enrollees, which could affect the act’s popularity and viability. Despite the potential 41 See Oversight Report, supra note 40, at 17.

42 See David K. Jones, Katharine W. V. Bradley and Jonathan Oberlander, Pascal’s Wager: Health Insurance Exchanges, Obamacare, and the Republican Dilemma, 39 J. Health Pol., Pol’y & L. 97, 130 (2014) (“The pervasive resistance to Obamacare was so strong that many states decided to cede control of the exchanges to the federal government.”).

for unlimited start-up funds and other entreaties by HHS, 34 states ultimately refused to establish exchanges.

After consultations with HHS, on August 17, 2011, the IRS proposed a regulation providing “a taxpayer is eligible for the credit . . . through an Exchange established under section 1311 or 1321 of the Affordable Care Act”—that is, without regard for whether the exchange was established by a state or the federal government. Though IRS officials had discussed whether this approach was permissible under Section 36B, the Federal Register notice included no mention of the contrary statutory language, much less any basis for the IRS’s departure from it. Nevertheless, many noticed and raised objections to the proposed rule.

The IRS did not heed these concerns. On May 23, 2012, it promulgated a final regulation purporting to authorize tax credits in exchanges established by HHS under Section 1321. The rule circumvented the statutory text by (1) declaring eligible taxpayers could obtain a tax credit if a qualifying insurance plan was purchased on “an Exchange” and then (2) adopting a definition of “Exchange” that HHS had promulgated (in coordination with the IRS) that purported to create full equivalence between state-established and federal exchanges.\(^4^9\)

The IRS acknowledged opposition to its interpretation, yet offered no more than a single conclusory paragraph in response, lacking any reference to relevant statutory text or other legal authority for its action:

The statutory language of section 36B and other provisions of the Affordable Care Act support the interpretation that credits are available to taxpayers who obtain coverage through a State Exchange, regional Exchange, subsidiary Exchange, and the Federally-facilitated Exchange. Moreover, the relevant legislative history does not demonstrate that Congress intended to limit the premium tax credit to State Exchanges. Accordingly, the final regulations maintain the rule in the proposed regulations because it is consistent with the language, purpose, and structure of section 36B and the Affordable Care Act as a whole.\(^5^0\)

The IRS purported to rely on the “relevant legislative history,” yet cited no legislative history to support the rule, perhaps because no such legislative history exists. This bears emphasis: to this day, neither the government, nor the Supreme Court, nor anyone else has identified even a single contemporaneous statement of any kind asserting that the ACA authorizes, or that its supporters intended for it to authorize, tax credits in federal exchanges.

The IRS rule created two types of legally cognizable injuries. First, the ACA’s employer mandate penalizes large employers if one or more employees are eligible for or receive a tax credit under Section 36B.\(^5^1\) By offering tax credits in non-establishing states, the IRS rule injures employers in those states by exposing them to penalties. Second, the individual mandate penalizes taxpayers who do not obtain coverage, but only if coverage is “affordable.”\(^5^2\) By offering tax credits in non-establishing states, the IRS rule makes coverage “affordable” for millions of taxpayers, and thus exposes them to penalties from which they would otherwise be exempt.

\(^4^9\) 45 CFR § 155.20 (2013) (defining “Exchange” as “an Exchange serving the individual market . . . regardless of whether the Exchange is established and operated by a State . . . or by HHS.”).

\(^5^1\) 26 U.S.C. § 4980H.

Injured parties soon began challenging the IRS rule in federal court. In September 2012, the state of Oklahoma became the first plaintiff, claiming injury as an employer (Oklahoma v. Burwell). In May 2013, a group of employers and individuals from multiple states filed a second challenge (Halbig v. Burwell). In September 2013, four Virginia residents challenged the rule (King v. Burwell). In October 2013, the state of Indiana and dozens of Indiana school districts filed a fourth challenge (Indiana v. IRS).

At district court, the government prevailed in Halbig and King, while the challengers prevailed in Oklahoma. On July 22, 2014, panels of the D.C. Circuit (Halbig) and the Fourth Circuit (King) issued conflicting rulings for and against the challengers, respectively, within hours of each other. In Halbig, the full D.C. Circuit granted the government’s request for en banc review. The King plaintiffs appealed their loss to the Supreme Court, which granted certiorari in November 2014.

IV. The Court’s King Ruling

The Supreme Court sided with the federal government, though not on the grounds urged by the solicitor general or most commentators. The chief justice’s opinion for the Court was joined by Justice Anthony Kennedy and the Court’s four “liberal” justices—Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen Breyer, Sonia Sotomayor, and Elena Kagan—none of whom concurred separately. The Court’s arch-textualist, Justice Antonin Scalia, authored a sharp, and at times caustic and sarcastic, dissent, joined by Justices Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito.

Chief Justice Roberts explained that while Section 36B may appear clear, it was actually “ambiguous” when viewed in a broader context. In the ordinary case, a finding of ambiguity would trigger deference to the implementing agency under the Chevron doctrine.

54 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2490–91.
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

King was not an ordinary case, however. Rather than defer to the IRS’s interpretation, the Court resolved the ambiguity itself. Turning again to the broader statutory context, and the potential effects of enforcing Section 36B as written, the Court concluded that the ACA should be read to authorize tax credits in federal exchanges. Though the text of Section 36B authorizes tax credits for insurance purchased on exchanges “established by the State under section 1311,” this language will henceforth be read to authorize tax credits for insurance purchased on exchanges established by states under Section 1311 or by the federal government under Section 1321.

Roberts’s primary rationale was that a “fair construction” of the statute requires more than giving meaning to discrete phrases—and cannot be constrained by the semantic meaning of ordinary terms, or even statutorily defined terms, such as “State.” The chief justice wrote that it is the Court’s job to avoid, “if at all possible,” an interpretation that would undermine the ACA’s goal of improving health insurance markets—such as an interpretation that, when combined with the intervening decisions of dozens of states not to establish exchanges, could create a “death spiral” of increasing costs and declining coverage. Therefore the statutory language was to be stretched so as to conform to “what we see as Congress’s plan.” If that required ignoring some portions of the text, or subverting another purpose of the statute, so be it. The chief justice decided where the Court should go and was determined not to let the text get in the way. But to make it work, the Court’s majority would have to find a way to dispense with “the most natural reading” of the relevant statutory provisions.\textsuperscript{60}

56 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2488–89 (“In extraordinary cases, however, there may be reason to hesitate before concluding that Congress has intended such an implicit delegation.” (quoting FDA v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 529 U.S. 120, 159 (2000))).

57 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2496.

58 Id.

Before looking at what the majority did, it is worth noting which arguments the Court did not adopt. It did not accept the primary arguments offered by the solicitor general. It did not accept that “established by the State” was a “statutory term of art,”\textsuperscript{61} nor did it claim the text clearly compelled its result, as the government also urged. Indeed, not a single justice adopted those arguments. To the contrary, the Court claimed the relevant text was ambiguous. While some critics maintained the plaintiffs’ arguments were frivolous or absurd, not a single justice expressed this view in an opinion.\textsuperscript{62} According to Chief Justice Roberts’s opinion for the Court, the plaintiffs’ “arguments about the plain meaning of Section 36B are strong.”\textsuperscript{63}

Though the Court claimed to be following “Congress’s plan,” it did not rely much on traditional sources of legislative history to determine Congress’s unstated purpose, and was quite selective in the sources of legislative history it did cite. Nor did the Court take the suggestion offered by some commentators that it should rely upon the scoring of the ACA by the Congressional Budget Office\textsuperscript{64} or $\alpha$

\textsuperscript{60} King, 135 S. Ct. at 2495.

\textsuperscript{62} Many commentators were quite dismissive of arguments against the IRS rule. One prominent critic called them “screwy,” “nutty,” and “stupid” (Erika Eichelberger, Conservatives Insist Obamacare Is on Its Deathbed, Mother Jones (Jan. 24, 2013), http://www.motherjones.com/print/214256). Others charged that the litigation was “frivolous” (Harold Pollack, If the Latest Obamacare Lawsuit Succeeds, Obamacare Is in Big Trouble, Wash. Post, Feb. 3, 2014, http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/wonkblog/wp/2014/02/03/if-the-latest-obamacare-lawsuit-succeeds-obamacare-is-in-big-trouble/); that it was “a conspicuously weak case that should never have reached the Supreme Court”; that it was “obvious” the ACA authorizes those provisions in federal exchanges; or that \textit{King} was nothing but a “trolling exercise” (Harold Pollack, The Greatest Trolling Exercise in the History of Health Policy Is Over, Politico (blog) (June 25, 2015), http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/06/health-care-supreme-court-king-burwell-119446.html). Not all commentators took this position, however. See Sarah Kliff, The Accidental Case Against Obamacare, Vox.com (May 26, 2015) ("When I read prominent people saying this case was frivolous, I winced a bit," says Nicholas Bagley, an assistant law professor at the University of Michigan who has written extensively on the \textit{King} challenge. “This is a serious lawsuit.”").

\textsuperscript{63} King, 135 S. Ct. at 2495.

\textsuperscript{64} See, e.g., Abbe Gluck, The “CBO Canon” and the Debate over Tax Credits on Federally Operated Health Insurance Exchanges, Balkinization (July 10, 2012), http://...
post comments offered by legislators and staff to explain the inconvenient wording of the relevant provisions.\(^\text{65}\) Though the Court admitted the ACA was the result of “inartful drafting,”\(^\text{66}\) it did not claim the relevant language was a scrivener’s error.

Some thought the Court might rely upon federalism principles to side with the government, out of a concern that conditioning tax credits on state cooperation would be unduly coercive.\(^\text{67}\) Several amici raised federalism concerns of various stripes,\(^\text{68}\) and Justice Kennedy seemed amenable to such an approach at oral argument.\(^\text{69}\)

\(^{65}\) See, e.g., Robert Pear, Four Words, \textit{supra} note 31 (“The answer, from interviews with more than two dozen Democrats and Republicans involved in writing the law, is that the words were a product of shifting politics and a sloppy merging of different versions. Some described the words as ‘inadvertent,’ ‘inartful’ or ‘a drafting error.’ But none supported the contention of the plaintiffs, who are from Virginia.”); but see text accompanying note 31, \textit{supra}. Doug Kendall, Carvin’s Cornhusker Quandry in King, Huffington Post (Jan. 30, 2015), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/doug-kendall/carvins-cornhusker-quanda_b_6581690.html (quoting Senator Nelson as saying, “I always believed that tax credits should be available in all 50 states regardless of who built the exchange, and the final law also reflects that belief as well.” (emphasis in original)); but see Michael F. Cannon, King v. Burwell: In 2013, Nelson Admitted He Didn’t Know If ACA Offered Subsidies in Fed. Exchanges, Forbes.com (Feb. 10, 2015), http://www.forbes.com/sites/michaelcannon/2015/02/10/king-v-burwell-in-2013-nelson-admitted-he-didnt-know-if-aca-offered-subsidies-in-fed-exchanges/ (“In other words, if we want to know what Nelson actually intended to become law, asking Ben Nelson is not an option. Our only option is to read the bill.”).

\(^{66}\) \textit{King}, 135 S. Ct. at 2492.

\(^{69}\) Transcript of Oral argument at 16, King v. Burwell, 135 S. Ct. 2480 (2015) (No. 14-114) (“JUSTICE KENNEDY: Let me say that from the standpoint of the dynam-
Yet there was no mention of federalism in the Court’s opinion. If such concerns did influence the justices, they did not see the need to mention them.

Perhaps tellingly, the Court openly adopted a non-textualist approach to interpreting the ACA. As Professor Abbe Gluck observed, “King is one of the only major text-oriented statutory interpretation decisions in recent memory in which the majority opinion barely includes a single canon of interpretation.” Moreover, the chief justice’s opinion expressly rejects some interpretive canons that textualists hold dear. As Gluck noted, “This is not Antonin Scalia’s textualism”—a point Justice Scalia’s dissent made clear. Instead, the Court adopted a “fair construction” of the statute over the plain meaning of relevant provisions and congressionally provided definitions.

The problem with the Court’s “fair construction” is that it considered only those parts of the statute that, once isolated, could be used to cast doubt on the intentionality of Section 36B, while it dismissed, disregarded, or distorted other provisions that completely dispel those doubts. If this is a “fair construction,” it is one that elevates judicial construction over legislative action.

V. Desperately Seeking Ambiguity

Chief Justice Roberts went to extraordinary lengths to find the act ambiguous. He conceded “the most natural reading of the pertinent statutory phrase” is that tax credits are available “only” through

71 Id.

72 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2492.

73 See Antonin Scalia & Bryan Garner, Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 57 (2012) (noting that for a court to find legislative purpose “in the absence of a clear indication in the text is to provide the judge’s answer rather than the text’s answer to the question”).

74 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2495.
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

“an Exchange established by the State under [Section 1311].” He implicitly conceded the ACA is otherwise silent on the question presented: the Court failed to identify even a single piece of statutory text or scrap of legislative history in which any member of Congress claimed the ACA would offer tax credits in federal exchanges. That should have resolved the matter. Nevertheless, Roberts still managed to find the operative text ambiguous “when read in context.”

There was no disagreement among the justices that statutory structure, design, and context are useful in resolving latent ambiguities in statutory provisions. As Justice Scalia counseled in dissent, “Statutory design and purpose matter only to the extent they help clarify an otherwise ambiguous provision.” Yet the majority not only used statutory context to resolve ambiguity, but to create the ambiguity in the first place. Worse, the majority considered text selectively and adopted inconsistent presumptions about the applicability of statutory provisions bearing on the question. Though Roberts conceded that “established by the State” is clear on its face and the only statutory text that speaks directly to the question presented, by the time he was done, he rendered that provision not only ambiguous but meaningless. It was as if the majority was determined to shoehorn inconvenient statutory text into a preconceived narrative of how the statute should operate. After all, as Roberts explained, the statute must be read this way “if at all possible.”

The Court’s judgment ultimately rested on a conclusion that the relevant text was “ambiguous”—or could at least be read as such in context. But what was ambiguous? Not the word “State,” given that Congress took pains to define this term to exclude federal

75 Id. at 2489.
76 See Brown & Williamson, 529 U.S. at 133 (noting that contextual interpretation must yield to an “insuperable textual barrier”); Conn. Nat’l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253–54 (1992) (“In interpreting a statute a court should always turn first to one, cardinal canon before all others . . . courts must presume that a legislature says in a statute what it means and means in a statute what it says there. When the words of a statute are unambiguous, then, this first canon is also the last.” (citations omitted)).
77 Id. at 2490.
78 See id. at 2492 (noting the “fundamental canon of statutory construction that the words of a statute must be read in their context and with a view to their place in the overall statutory scheme” (quoting FDA v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 529 U. S. 120, 133 (2000))); id. at 2502 (Scalia, J., dissenting).
79 See King, 135 S. Ct. at 2502. (Scalia, J., dissenting).
exchanges. Perhaps “establish” is ambiguous, but not in a way that muddies whether it is the state or HHS that is doing the establishing.

Consider in more detail the analysis underlying the majority’s conclusion that the statute is “properly viewed as ambiguous” on the question of whether it authorizes tax credits in federal exchanges. As the Court accepted, “the most natural reading of the pertinent statutory phrase” is that the ACA authorizes tax credits “only” through “an Exchange established by the State under [Section 1311].” Under this language, for tax credits to issue, “three things must be true: First, the individual must enroll in an insurance plan through ‘an Exchange.’ Second, that Exchange must be ‘established by the State.’ And third, that Exchange must be established ‘under [Section 1311].’

The first requirement, that tax credits are only available for the purchase of insurance through “an Exchange,” is uncontroversial, as is the proposition that both state and federal exchanges satisfy this initial requirement, even though limiting tax credits to exchange-based insurance purchases limits their availability and potentially undermines the legislative purpose of subsidizing insurance. Section 1321 requires the HHS secretary to “establish” an exchange in any state that fails to do so (or otherwise fails to comply with relevant ACA requirements) and indicates that this exchange should be the practical equivalent of the exchange for which it substitutes. Federal and state exchanges may be “established by different sovereigns,” the Court wrote, but both enable consumers to engage in comparison shopping and facilitate government regulation of health insurance offerings.

80 See 42 U.S.C. § 18024(d).
81 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2491.
82 Id. at 2495.
83 Id. at 2489.
84 Id.
85 Actually, the government has ignored this tax-credit eligibility requirement as well. Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, Health Law Fix for State-Run Websites, Assoc. Press, Feb. 28, 2014 (“HHS said state residents who were unable to sign up because of technical problems may still get federal tax credits if they bought private insurance outside of the new online insurance exchanges.”).
86 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2489.
87 See Max Baucus, Reforming America’s Health Care System: A Call to Action, S. Fin. Comm., Nov. 12, 2008, at 17 (“The Exchange would be an independent entity, the primary purpose of which would be to organize affordable health insurance options,
Next the Court turned to the phrase “established by the State.” This language would seem to be clear and unambiguous. Any member of Congress who had bothered to read the relevant provisions would have understood what it meant. As Chief Justice Roberts conceded, “it might seem that a Federal Exchange cannot fulfill this requirement.” Lest there be any doubt, as the majority conceded, the ACA defines “State” in a manner “that does not include the Federal Government.”

Despite the plain meaning of “established by the State,” despite the statutory definition of “State,” despite the consistent (and conventional) usage of the word “establish” throughout the statute, and despite the majority’s acknowledgement that the plaintiffs offered “the most natural reading of the pertinent statutory phrase,” the majority asserted that “when read in context, ‘with a view to [its] place in the overall statutory scheme,’ the meaning of that phrase ‘established by the State’ is not so clear.” Other provisions of the statute, the majority wrote, “suggest that the Act may not always use the phrase ‘established by the State’ in its most natural sense.”

The Court cites just one statutory provision, found in Section 1312, to substantiate its claim that other provisions of the ACA “suggest” that “established by the State” “may not” mean what it says. Yet not only does that provision not contradict or other undermine...
Cato Supreme Court Review

a straightforward interpretation of “established by the State,” it does not even utilize that phrase.

Section 1312 defines “qualified individuals,” in relevant part, as those who “reside[] in the State that established the Exchange.” The majority thinks this casts doubt on the plain meaning of “established by the State.” Why? If the Court were to interpret such language as drawing distinctions between state-established and federal exchanges, the majority reasoned, then “there would be no ‘qualified individuals’ on Federal Exchanges.” Federal exchanges would therefore not be able to meet several requirements the act imposes with respect to qualified individuals. For example, explains Chief Justice Roberts, “the Act requires all Exchanges to ‘make available qualified health plans to qualified individuals’—something an Exchange could not do if there were no such individuals.”

The majority’s argument fails on three levels. First, as Justice Scalia notes in dissent, it would be perfectly reasonable for Congress to create a category of enrollees that is unique to state-established exchanges:

Imagine that a university sends around a bulletin reminding every professor to take the “interests of graduate students” into account when setting office hours, but that some professors teach only undergraduates. Would anybody reason that the bulletin implicitly presupposes that every professor has “graduate students,” so that “graduate students” must really mean “graduate or undergraduate students”? Surely not. Just as one naturally reads instructions about graduate students to be inapplicable to the extent a particular professor has no such students, so too would one naturally read instructions about qualified individuals to be inapplicable to the extent a particular Exchange has no such individuals.

The majority responds that Congress would have had no reason to detail requirements related to “qualified individuals” if there were to be no qualified individuals in federal exchanges. Yet such reasons abound, both in the ACA and its legislative history. Sections

94 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2490.
95 Id.
96 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2501 (Scalia, J., dissenting).
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

1311, 1321, and other provisions make clear that many Senate Democrats feared that states might not implement the ACA as well or as faithfully as the secretary would. The ACA therefore provides wide discretion to the secretary, while states get detailed instructions.\textsuperscript{97} There is thus nothing about the “qualified individuals” definition that casts doubt on the meaning of “established by the State.” Any anomalies the majority identifies flow not from the text, but from the majority’s atextual assumptions about Congress’s plan.

Second, context further shows that the “qualified individuals” definition casts no doubt on what Congress meant by “established by the State,” and instead supports the plain meaning of that phrase. There is a reason why Section 1312 defines “qualified individuals” in terms of “the State that established the Exchange.” In Sections 1311, 1312, and 1313, Congress is speaking to states. Those sections direct states to establish exchanges and detail related requirements. Section 1312 defines “qualified individuals” in terms of “the State that established the Exchange” because the whole point of these sections is that Congress is presuming that states will establish exchanges.

Context also shows the “qualified individuals” definition still has applicability to federal exchanges, despite the fact that they are not established by states. In the very next section, Section 1321, Congress drops the presumption that each state will establish an exchange, and explains what the secretary “shall” do if states fail to establish exchanges. Section 1321 directs the secretary to “issue regulations setting standards for meeting the requirements under this title,” which encompasses regulations for both state-established and federal exchanges, and to implement “such . . . requirements” if a state fails to do so. That is, if Sections 1311, 1312, or 1313 impose requirements on state-established exchanges that would be inappropriate in the case of a federal exchange, Section 1321 authorizes the secretary to issue and enforce a parallel requirement. In this case, it authorizes the HHS secretary to develop a “qualified individuals” definition appropriate to federal exchanges—that is, that qualified individuals must reside in the state “within” which “the Secretary . . . establish[es]” an Exchange.\textsuperscript{98} The only ambiguity that exists is whether the ACA requires the secretary to develop a “qualified individuals” definition for federal exchanges or (per Justice Scalia) merely authorizes her to do so. In neither case does Section 1321’s “qualified individuals” definition cast doubt on the meaning of “established by the State.”

\textsuperscript{97} See PPACA § 1321; 42 U.S.C. § 18041.
\textsuperscript{98} See id. at (a), (c).

Thus it is not true that giving the phrase “established by the State” its plain meaning would mean there would be no qualified individuals in federal exchanges. Context shows that Congress covered that contingency. Unfortunately, the Court only looked to part of the context—the part that supported its preconceived understanding of “Congress’s plan.”

Third, even if one were to conclude that the provisions relating to “qualified individuals” created an anomaly, this does not “suggest,” let alone demonstrate, that other language used in other parts of the statute is ambiguous. The majority’s reliance on the “qualified individual” provision on this point is even more curious given the majority’s refusal to consider the operation of the phrase “established by the State” in other parts of the ACA. “Because the other provisions cited by the dissent are not at issue here,” the majority meekly explains in a footnote, “we do not address them.”

The majority did not even address the reference to exchanges “established by the State” in Section 1311, despite that section’s obvious relevance to the question at hand. So much for considering the statute as a whole.

When the majority turns to consider whether an exchange established by the federal government as required under Section 1321 could qualify as an exchange established “under Section 1311,” it takes further liberties with the statutory text. Here, the majority claims that the statutory definition of an “Exchange” forces the conclusion that Section 1321 “authorizes the Secretary to establish an Exchange under Section [1311], not (or not only) under Section [1321].” The relevant text does nothing of the kind.

The linchpin of the majority’s argument here is the statutory definition of “Exchange” provided for in ACA Section 1563: “The term ‘Exchange’ means an American Health Benefit Exchange established under section 1311 of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care

---

99 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2493 n.3.

100 42 U.S.C. § 18031(f)(3) (“AUTHORITY TO CONTRACT.— (A) IN GENERAL.—A State may elect to authorize an Exchange established by the State under this section to enter into an agreement with an eligible entity to carry out 1 or more responsibilities of the Exchange.” (emphasis added)). See infra note 112 and accompanying text.

101 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2490–91.
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

Act.” According to the majority, “every time the Act uses the word ‘Exchange,’ the definitional provision requires that we substitute the phrase ‘Exchange established under section [1311].’” The statute flatly contradicts this claim.

Section 1563 adds that definition of “Exchange” to the Public Health Service Act to conform that statute to the ACA. Section 1551 then conforms the ACA to the PHSA by circuitously importing that and other PHSA definitions back into the ACA. Contrary to the majority opinion, however, Section 1551 expressly provides that PHSA definitions are not to be applied “every time” the relevant terms are mentioned in the ACA. Section 1551 provides that PHSA definitions “shall apply” to the ACA “unless specifically provided for otherwise.” With respect to federal exchanges, the ACA specifically provides that PHSA definitions “shall apply” to the ACA “unless specifically provided for otherwise.” Thus the PHSA definition that exchanges are “established under Section 1311” does not apply. The majority’s claim that the ACA “requires” the Court to insert this definition of “Exchange” into Section 1321 is simply false. The majority erases the distinction between Section 1311 exchanges and Section 1321 exchanges only by ignoring Congress’s express instructions. After it cavalierly interprets a universal definition of “State” to be conditional, the majority then interprets a conditional definition of “Exchange” to be universal—all in the name of “what we see as Congress’s plan.”

Having sufficiently tampered with two statutory definitions, the majority then proceeds to claim that federal exchanges established under Section 1321 are also established under Section 1311. “All of the requirements that an Exchange must meet are in Section [1311],” the majority asserts. Therefore, a federal exchange must be “established under Section 1311” or else “literally none of the Act’s requirements would apply to them.” Again, the statute flatly contradicts the majority’s claims.

103 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2491 (emphasis added).
104 PPACA § 1551.
105 42 U.S.C. § 18041(c)(1). See also 45 CFR § 155.20 (2013) (“Federally-facilitated Exchange means an Exchange established and operated within a State by the Secretary under section 1321(c)(1) of the Affordable Care Act.”).
106 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2491.
107 Id.
It is not true that “all of the requirements” for exchanges are contained in Section 1311. Sections 1312 and 1313 also impose requirements on exchanges. The reconciliation amendments imposed reporting requirements on exchanges codified in Section 36B of the Internal Revenue Code—the provisions created by Section 1401—and those requirements distinguished between Section 1311 and Section 1321 exchanges. Section 1321 imposes requirements on exchanges when it obligates the HHS secretary to “issue regulations setting standards” for exchanges to meet “the requirements under this title” (that is, not just Section 1311), and further authorizes the secretary to impose “such other requirements as the Secretary determines appropriate” (that is, beyond what the ACA itself requires).

Indeed, far from conflating state-run and federal exchanges, Section 1321 draws a bright line between the two. It authorizes the secretary to write rules for both Section 1311 exchanges and Section 1321 exchanges, which remain distinct. This authority includes the ability to write separate rules for federal exchanges in cases where the rules for state-established exchanges would make no sense.

The majority’s selective contextualism creates anomalies that exist nowhere under a plain-meaning interpretation of Section 36B and the act’s broader context. For example, the ACA prohibits the use of federal funds for the operating expenses of Section 1311 exchanges. Under a plain-meaning interpretation, where Section 1311 and 1321 exchanges are distinct, this poses no problems. Section 1321 authorizes the secretary to draft a parallel rule appropriate to federally administered exchanges (for example, that they may use federal funds, but must be self-sufficient). If the majority were correct that federal exchanges are Section 1311 exchanges, however, it would create the anomaly that federal exchanges must somehow operate with no federal funds. Likewise, Section 1311 grants states the power to choose whether “an Exchange established by the State” may contract out certain exchange functions. If the majority were correct that federal exchanges are “established by the State under Section 1311,” it would create an anomaly where states that did not establish exchanges could dictate whether a federal agency may contract with outside entities. The majority's selective contextualism creates such anomalies by ignoring these and other provisions that reveal Congress's actual plan to be quite different from what the majority imagines.

110 42 U.S.C. § 18041(a), (c) (emphasis added).

True to form, the majority does devote attention to a part of Section 1321 that, once isolated, it uses to cast doubt on the clear line Section 36B draws between state-established and federal exchanges. To support its conclusion that the phrase “Exchange established by the State under Section [1311]” could refer to “all Exchanges—both State and Federal—at least for purposes of the tax credits,” it points to Section 1321’s instructions to the HHS secretary. This provision provides that should a state fail to create the “required Exchange,” the secretary shall “establish and operate such Exchange within the State.”

According to the majority, “by using the words ‘such Exchange,’ the Act indicates that State and Federal Exchanges should be the same.” The majority is correct in that this language indicates the exchange established by the secretary should perform the same general functions as those established by states under Section 1311. Section 1321 anticipates this by expressly authorizing the secretary to adopt regulations providing that HHS exchanges will operate like state exchanges. Yet this is not enough to fulfill the requirements of Section 36B, as the relevant language speaks both to the type of exchange in which tax credits are to be available, as well as the sovereign that has established it. So even if “such Exchange” could be read to make a Section 1321 exchange legally equivalent to a Section 1311 exchange, it is still not an exchange “established by the State.”

This understanding is confirmed by consideration of other relevant provisions of the statute. Section 1323 provides that when a U.S. territory creates “such an Exchange,” the territory “shall be treated

113 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2491.
114 42 U.S.C. § 18041 (c).
115 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2491.
116 See id. at 2489–90 (“State and Federal Exchanges are established by different sovereigns”); see also Halbig v. Burwell, 758 F.3d 390, 400 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (“[S]ubsidies also turn on a third attribute of Exchanges: who established them.”).
as a State.”\textsuperscript{117} The fact that Congress considered it necessary to insert that explicit equivalence language shows that Congress did not consider the word “such” to have the meaning the majority claims. Similarly, when Congress sought to create full equivalence between actions undertaken by the federal and state governments it did so explicitly. Section 1322, for instance, conditions recognition of an organization as a “qualified nonprofit health insurance issuer,” in part, on the state adopting insurance market reforms or “the Secretary ha[ving] implemented [the reforms] for the State.”\textsuperscript{118} Congress knew full well how to authorize the federal government to stand in the state’s shoes. It did not do so here. The phrase “such Exchange” may indicate that federal exchanges have the same intrinsic characteristics as a state-established exchange, but tax-credit eligibility hinges on the extrinsic characteristic of which sovereign established the exchange.

The majority seeks further support for its conclusion that the relevant language is ambiguous by pointing to “several provisions that assume tax credits will be available on both State and Federal Exchanges.”\textsuperscript{119} Yet the first two provisions the majority cites in support of this proposition are taken from Section 1311—the very section that instructs states to create exchanges in the first place. That Section 1311 includes provisions that assume tax credits will be available in Section 1311 exchanges is hardly surprising given that Section 1401 provides tax credits in exchanges “established by the State under Section 1311.” These provisions lend no support for the majority’s position. At best, they beg the question.

The majority also points to Section 36B’s requirements that both state and federal exchanges report information on health insurance purchases, including information about any tax credits provided.”\textsuperscript{120} In the majority’s view it “would make little sense” to require reporting on tax credits were such credits not available in federal exchanges.\textsuperscript{121} Yet even under the majority’s interpretation, these reporting requirements apply to instances where tax credits are not available.

\textsuperscript{117} 42 U.S.C. § 18043(a)(1).
\textsuperscript{118} 42 U.S.C. § 18042(c)(6).
\textsuperscript{119} King, 135 S. Ct. at 2491.
\textsuperscript{121} King, 135 S. Ct. at 2492.
This requirement obligates all exchanges to report information on all enrollees, yet not all those who purchase insurance on exchanges are eligible for tax credits due to income or other characteristics. Further, as the D.C. Circuit noted in Halbig, “even if credits are unavailable on federal Exchanges, reporting by those Exchanges still serves the purpose of enforcing the individual mandate—a point the IRS, in fact, acknowledged.”

Having walked through “Exchange established by the State under Section [1311],” the majority now concludes that this phrase “is properly viewed as ambiguous.” Yet the majority’s tortured path came at the expense of plain language and Congress’s express commands. That’s not all. In his dissent, Justice Scalia summarized some of the other steps the majority took in its quest to find ambiguity:

To mention just the highlights, the Court’s interpretation clashes with a statutory definition, renders words inoperative in at least seven separate provisions of the Act, overlooks the contrast between provisions that say “Exchange” and those that say “Exchange established by the State,” gives the same phrase one meaning for purposes of tax credits but an entirely different meaning for other purposes, and (let us not forget) contradicts the ordinary meaning of the words Congress used. On the other side of the ledger, the Court has come up with nothing more than a general provision that turns out to be controlled by a specific one, a handful of clauses that are consistent with either understanding of establishment by the State, and a resemblance between the tax-credit provision and the rest of the Tax Code. If that is all it takes to make something ambiguous, everything is ambiguous.

Indeed.

VI. A Most Plausible Implausibility

Having concluded that the relevant statutory text is “ambiguous,” the majority turns “to the broader structure of the Act to determine the meaning of Section 36B.” Rather than consider the text of

---

*122 758 F. 3d. at 403.
123 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2491.
124 Id. at 2502–03 (Scalia, J., dissenting).
125 Id. at 2492.*
the ACA, however, the majority focused instead on the “statutory scheme”—the aforementioned three-legged stool—and concluded that tax credits simply must be available in federal exchanges. Otherwise, the act would threaten to “destabilize” the individual insurance market in any state that failed to establish its own exchange. The idea that Congress would allow such a result, the majority reasoned, was “implausible.”\textsuperscript{126} Section 36B’s tax credits “are necessary for Federal Exchanges to function like their State Exchange counterparts, and to avoid the type of calamitous result that Congress plainly meant to avoid.”\textsuperscript{127}

The majority hangs its resolution of this purported ambiguity upon its assumption that Congress would not have enacted a provision that threatened to undermine its goal of expanding health insurance coverage. More specifically, the majority concluded that Congress would not have imposed costly restrictions on health insurance providers, such as community-rated premiums, without also imposing mandates and providing subsidies to stabilize markets. However reasonable this assumption may seem in the abstract, the ACA’s legislative history flatly contradicts it. The ACA’s leading advocates considered, supported, and in some cases enacted provisions that would undermine the very coverage expansions the majority claims Congress would never undermine. While the majority assumes ACA supporters would not support community rating without also providing for subsidies and a mandate to combat the resulting instability, they did exactly that, over and over again, including where the Court claimed Congress wouldn’t.

Both the ACA and the House bill created a long-term-care entitlement program called the Community Living Assistance Services and Supports (CLASS) Act. Each bill imposed community-rated premiums \textit{and} an explicit prohibition on subsidies that might reduce the resulting instability.\textsuperscript{128} ACA supporters enacted these provisions

\textsuperscript{126} Id. at 2493–94.
\textsuperscript{127} Id. at 2496.
\textsuperscript{128} 42 U.S.C. § 300ll-7(b) (“No taxpayer funds shall be used for payment of benefits under a CLASS Independent Benefit Plan. For purposes of this subsection, the term ‘taxpayer funds’ means any federal funds from a source other than premium.”). Richard S. Foster, Ctr. for Medicare & Medicaid Servs., Estimated Financial Effects of the “America’s Affordable Health Choices Act of 2009” (H.R. 3962), as Passed by the House on November 7, 2009 (2009), at 10.
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

despite repeated warnings that “voluntary, unsubsidized, and non-underwritten insurance programs such as CLASS face a significant risk of failure as a result of adverse selection by participants.”\textsuperscript{129} The CLASS Act promptly collapsed, and Congress repealed it.\textsuperscript{130} According to Chief Justice Roberts, the CLASS Act doesn’t count because it is “a comparatively minor program” and not part of “the general health insurance program—the very heart of the Act.”\textsuperscript{131} Again, so much for reading the statute as a whole.

That objection cannot be raised against Congress’s imposition of the ACA’s prohibitions on pre-existing-condition exclusions and discrimination based on health status with respect to children. In the market for child-only health insurance policies, the ACA imposed these measures beginning September 23, 2010—more than three years before it provided subsidies or imposed a purchase mandate.\textsuperscript{132} Those markets either constricted or completely collapsed in two-thirds of the states.\textsuperscript{133} These facts belie the majority’s claims that Congress deemed all three legs of the stool “should take effect on the same day—January 1, 2014,”\textsuperscript{134} and that ACA supporters subordinated everything to their desire “to avoid adverse selection in the health insurance markets.”\textsuperscript{135}

Moreover, in developing the ACA, Congress indisputably considered provisions that would condition tax credits and other subsidies for the purchase of insurance on state cooperation, and advanced legislation that could force exchanges to operate without the benefit of premium subsidies. The HELP bill, for example, withheld premium subsidies in any state that refused to implement that bill’s employer

\textsuperscript{129} Id. at 11. See also Am. Academy of Actuaries, Critical Issues in Health Reform: Community Living Assistance Service and Supports Act (CLASS) (2009).

\textsuperscript{131} King, 135 S. Ct. at 2494 n.4.

\textsuperscript{132} Pub. L. 111–148, § 1255 (“the provisions of [42 U.S.C. 300gg–3] (as amended by section 1201), as they apply to enrollees who are under 19 years of age, shall become effective for plan years beginning on or after the date that is 6 months after the date of enactment of this Act”).

\textsuperscript{134} King, 135 S. Ct. at 2487.

\textsuperscript{135} Id. at 2494 n.4 (emphasis in original).
mandate. The result, in non-cooperating states, would have been exchanges selling health insurance subject to even more destabilizing community-rating price controls than the ACA imposes, but without any subsidies to rescue those markets. All 12 HELP Committee Democrats, a group that included several of the ACA’s authors, voted in favor of that bill and that provision. One cannot reasonably argue the plain meaning of Section 36B is implausible when even the government and its amici concede that the ACA’s authors supported another bill that also could have destroyed health insurance markets in uncooperative states.\textsuperscript{136} And yet, to determine what ACA supporters were thinking, the Court relied on testimony delivered by a non-member of Congress to the HELP Committee, and ignored legislation produced by the HELP Committee—that is, by a dozen of the ACA’s authors and supporters—that dispositively shows ACA supporters accepted conditioning exchange subsidies on state cooperation.\textsuperscript{137}

Similarly, the Finance bill conditioned small-business tax credits on states implementing that bill’s community-rating price controls.\textsuperscript{138} Senate Democrats dropped these provisions from the Finance and HELP bills at the same time they reinforced the Finance provisions conditioning tax credits on states establishing exchanges.

Congress was willing to risk even more destruction with the ACA’s Medicaid expansion. As the ACA was originally drafted, state refusal to expand Medicaid would result in the loss of health insurance subsidies for the most vulnerable segments of society. Even after the Court severed the Medicaid expansion from traditional Medicaid in \textit{NFIB}, it remains the case that a state’s refusal to accept the expansion exposes the poorest of the working poor to higher health insurance costs in the individual market, while depriving them of tax credits to subsidize insurance purchases. This is because Section 36B requires individuals to earn at least 100 percent of the federal poverty line to be eligible for subsidies.\textsuperscript{139} It also remains the case that a state's refusal to participate in traditional Medicaid would eliminate subsidies for the poorest of the poor. One cannot reasonably argue it is \textit{implausible} that Congress would give states the power to "destroy" coverage for 8.5 million \textit{moderate}-income individuals when it is undisputed that Congress gave and continues to give states the power to destroy coverage for 50 million \textit{low}-income individuals.

\textsuperscript{136} See \textit{supra} note 36.

\textsuperscript{137} \text{King, 135 S. Ct. at 2486. See also Confirmation Hearing on the Nomination of John G. Roberts, Jr. to Be Chief Justice of the United States, Hearing Before the Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, 109th Cong., First Session, S. HRG. 109–158, (Sept.12–15, 2005) (explaining the use of legislative history to resolve textual ambiguities “requires a certain sensitivity . . . . All legislative history is not created equal.”).}

\textsuperscript{138} See S. 1796, 111th Cong. (2009), § 1221(a), proposing 26 U.S.C. § 45R(c)(2) (“STATE FAILURE TO ADOPT INSURANCE RATING REFORMS. — No credit shall be determined under this section . . . for any month of coverage before the first month the State establishing the exchange has in effect the insurance rating reforms . . . .”); S. Rep. No. 111-89, at 48 (2009), http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/CRPT- 111srpt89/pdf/CRPT-111srpt89.pdf (“If a State has not yet adopted the reformed rating rules, qualifying small business employers in the State are not eligible to receive the credit.”).

Chief Justice Roberts's conclusion that it is "implausible" that Congress could have intended Section 36B to work as written is simply false. ACA supporters offered too many similar proposals to claim Congress could not have meant what it said in Section 36B.\textsuperscript{140}

Beyond the health care context, Congress often enacts laws that rely upon state cooperation, and that risk severe adverse consequences should states fail to comply. It often enacts statutes with conflicting goals; the ACA contains conflicting goals in its very title. It often enacts legislation that undermines its stated goals or upsets the expectations of individual legislators.\textsuperscript{141} Environmental law is replete with such examples, including pollution-control laws that increase pollution\textsuperscript{142} and species-conservation laws that undermine species conservation.\textsuperscript{143} It is indisputable that portions of the ACA undermine other stated goals and produce results that some supporters failed to anticipate, such as when the law threw millions out of their existing insurance plans.\footnote{See Angie Drobnic Holan, Lie of the Year: ‘If You Like Your Health Care Plan, You Can Keep It,’ PolitiFact (Dec. 12, 2013, 4:44 PM). This example, in particular, shows that many who supported the ACA in Congress either did not understand the law for which they voted, or were willing to deliberately misrepresent it in order to ensure its passage. Either way, the frequency with which members of Congress and the president were willing to say “if you like your health insurance plan, you can keep it” should illustrate the danger of relying upon “Congress’s plan” when it is not embodied in the text of the statute at issue.}

\textsuperscript{139} See King, 135 S. Ct. at 2495 (quoting definition of "applicable taxpayer" eligible for tax credits).

\textsuperscript{141} See generally, Steven M. Gillon, That's Not What We Meant to Do: Reform and Its Unintended Consequences in the Twentieth Century (2000).

\textsuperscript{142} One of the best-known examples is documented in Bruce Ackerman & William Hassler, Clean Coal, Dirty Air: Or How the Clean Air Act Became a Multibillion-Dollar Bail-Out for High-Sulfur Coal Producers (1981); see also Jonathan H. Adler, Clean Fuels, Dirty Air, in Environmental Politics: Public Costs, Private Rewards (1992).

What is unique about the ACA was not that Congress passed a law with conflicting goals, or that the law threatened to withhold valuable benefits and impose a more punitive regulatory structure on non-cooperating states, but that so many states refused to cooperate. Moreover, as the large number of state amici supporting the \textit{King} petitioners illustrates, many states preferred that deal to the one the majority offers them.\footnote{See, e.g., Brief of Amici Curiae Indiana and 39 Indiana Public School Corporations, \textit{King} v. \textit{Burwell}, 135 S. Ct. 2480 (2015) (No. 14-114); Brief of Amici Curiae Oklahoma, et al., \textit{King} v. \textit{Burwell}, 135 S. Ct. 2480 (2015) (No. 14-114).}

Ironically, the Court’s reliance upon its predetermined sense of “Congress’s plan” may doom one of Congress’s goals. As the \textit{New York Times} noted just after the decision was released, \textit{King} may have “killed state-based exchanges.”\footnote{See Margot Sanger-Katz, Obamacare Ruling May Have Just Killed State-Based Exchanges, \textit{The Upshot}, \textit{N.Y. Times}, June 25, 2015, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2015/06/26/upshot/obamacare-ruling-may-have-just-killed-state-based-exchanges.html?abt=0002&abg=0.} This is because, absent the threat of losing tax credits, the ACA offers states minimal inducement for the difficult and thankless task of creating and operating exchanges.\footnote{Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, High Costs Plague Some State-Run Health Insurance Markets, \textit{Associated Press} (Jul. 27, 2015) (“Now that the Supreme Court has ruled the Obama administration can keep subsidizing premiums in all 50 states through HealthCare.gov, no longer is there a downside for states turning to Washington . . . The pendulum probably will swing toward a greater federal role in the next couple of years, said Jim Wadleigh, director of Connecticut’s Access Health.”).} The idea that Congress conditioned tax credits on state cooperation, under the assumption that most (if not all) states would fall quickly into line, is more plausible than the idea Congress enacted a law encouraging federal exchanges in every state. Indeed, some senators who voted for the ACA made clear that was an option they would not support. And yet that is the law King gives us.148
King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

VII. Chevron’s Domain vs. King’s Dominion

As noted above, the Court’s King opinion rests on its conclusion that the relevant statutory language, when read in context, is ambiguous. Under normal circumstances, this would mean the government wins under step two of the Chevron doctrine, which provides that when a statute is ambiguous, courts should defer to the interpretation of the implementing agency. Not here. Instead, the chief justice explained, resolving the ambiguity was the job of the Court because the underlying question—whether tax credits are available for the purchase of health insurance in federally established exchanges—was sufficiently “extraordinary,” and of such “deep economic and political significance,” that it should not be left to an administrative agency, particularly one (like the IRS) lacking “expertise in crafting health insurance policy of this sort.”149 This meant that it was up to the Court to resolve the ambiguity it had discovered in the ACA, in this case by molding the relevant language to conform to the Court’s understanding of Congress’s plan.

There was precedent for the Court’s refusal to apply Chevron deference. The Supreme Court similarly refused to defer to the Food and Drug Administration on whether tobacco could be regulated under the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act150 and the Environmental Protection Agency on whether greenhouse gases constituted “pollutants” under the Clean Air Act.151 The chief justice had also urged a narrow conception of Chevron’s domain in City of Arlington v. Federal Communications Commission, though in dissent.152

149 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2489 (citation omitted).

The rationale for refusing to apply Chevron deference in such cases is that such deference is only appropriate where Congress would have wanted the implementing agency to exercise such authority. That is, agencies get Chevron deference when a statute is ambiguous and it is reasonable to believe Congress meant to delegate interpretive authority to the agency. Based on his City of Arlington dissent, it seems that the chief justice is committed to this principle. Whether a consistent majority of the Court concurs is an open question.153

The chief justice was unwilling to presume Congress had delegated the IRS authority to construe provisions of the Internal Revenue Code, because Congress had failed to expressly delegate such authority. Yet he had little difficulty presuming that Congress had authorized the payment of billions of dollars in refundable tax credits, not to mention the resulting penalties, without expressly providing so. Such authorization was to be found, if at all, in Congress’s unstated “plan.” What makes this inconsistency all the more striking is the Court’s failure to engage with the precedents expressly counseling against assuming that Congress authorizes expenditures or tax benefits obliquely.154

E lecting not to apply Chevron in King also allowed the majority to sidestep the fact that the IRS had never provided much of an explanation for its rule. As noted above, the IRS offered no more than a cursory and conclusory justification for its interpretation of Section 36B, failing to provide any substantive response to critical public comments on the proposed rule. Compared with the sort of legal analysis that typically accompanies important rulemakings of this type, the IRS’s concise statement was utterly lacking. Under the 153 The same may be true of Justice Kennedy, who authored Gonzales v. Oregon, 546 U.S. 243 (2006) (holding that the Attorney General’s interpretation of “legitimate medical purpose” under the Controlled Substance Act did not merit Chevron deference). Justices Ginsburg, Kagan, and Sotomayor joined Justice Scalia’s broad application of Chevron deference in City of Arlington v. FCC and Justice Breyer concurred in the result. Of those joining the King majority, only Justice Kennedy joined Chief Justice Roberts’s dissent.

---

154 See, e.g., United States v. Wells Fargo Bank, 485 U.S. 351, 354 (1988) (citing “the settled principle that exemptions from taxation are not to be implied; they must be unambiguously proved”); see also Yazoo & Miss. Valley R.R. Co. v. Thomas, 132 U.S. 174, 183 (1889) (holding that tax credits and the like “must be expressed in clear and unambiguous terms”).
traditional standards of judicial review of agency action, it is hard to see how what the IRS did could constitute reasoned decisionmaking.

In other words, the IRS expanded its power by doing the opposite of what the ACA says, provided no justification until forced to do so by Congress and the courts, for years thereafter offered a constantly shifting series of post-hoc rationalizations, and still got away with it. The solicitor general’s claim that “established by the State” was an undefined statutory term of art, for example, made its first appearance in the government’s merits brief before the Supreme Court, years after the IRS rule was finalized. By assuming the role of final interpreter for itself, the Court was able to uphold the substance of the IRS rule without passing judgment on the IRS’s manifestly unreasonable rulemaking.155

While this approach to Chevron did not come at the expense of the administration’s preferred outcome in King, it may hamper other administrative initiatives in the future. As commentators have already noted, this aspect of the King decision gives opponents of agency action a new arrow for their legal quivers.156 When confronted with particularly ambitious agency interpretations, challengers can argue the question at issue should not be left to the agency—and the higher the stakes, the more compelling this argument will be. One example of where King could affect other agencies is the Environmental 155 This also enabled the Court to avoid confronting the “fundamental rule of administrative law” that courts “must judge the propriety” of agency actions “solely by the grounds invoked by the agency.” See SEC v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194 (1947). As the Chenery Court explained, courts have no warrant for substituting their arguments for those offered by the agency:

---

> If those grounds are inadequate or improper, the court is powerless to affirm the administrative action by substituting what it considers to be a more adequate or proper basis. To do so would propel the court into the domain which Congress has set aside exclusively for the administrative agency.

Id. at 196.

Protection Agency’s Clean Power Plan. So while many in the Obama administration cheered the outcome in King, the Court’s rationale may have given officials in some agencies something to worry about. Then again, it remains to be seen whether there really are five consistent votes on the Court for this approach.

VIII. Altering the Deal

King was not the first time that the chief justice would stretch the ACA’s text in service of his notion of how the statute should read. Roberts’s opinion in NFIB adopted multiple saving constructions of the statutory text so as to overcome potential constitutional infirmities. The result, as in King, was a statute quite different from the one Congress actually enacted.

One of the most controversial aspects of the ACA is the so-called “individual mandate”—a requirement that individuals obtain qualifying health insurance or pay a penalty. Roberts’s controlling opinion in NFIB found the individual mandate as written—a command imposed under Congress’s power to regulate interstate commerce—to be unconstitutional. Roberts nevertheless declined to invalidate the provision because he concluded that the assessment for noncompliance could be characterized as a “tax” and therefore justified as a use of Congress’s taxing power. That Congress termed the assessment a penalty instead of a tax—and that the ACA’s supporters repeatedly disclaimed that the penalty was a “tax” because it would not have passed otherwise—was not enough to let the plain text of the law guide Roberts’s understanding.

Nor did it matter that this interpretation could constrain the individual mandate’s operation in the future: Roberts concluded that the assessment could be considered a tax rather than a penalty because the amount was significantly less than the cost of buying coverage, and therefore was not large enough to coerce individuals into purchasing health insurance. But that means that the mandate will be less effective in fulfilling its stated purpose of preventing adverse selection.\textsuperscript{161} If the assessment is significantly less than the cost of purchasing qualifying health insurance, many uninsured individuals will lack a sufficient incentive to purchase insurance before they are sick. The logical response to this problem would be to increase the assessment, but Roberts’s \textit{NFIB} opinion limits Congress’s ability to do so because—at some unknown amount—a higher assessment ceases to be a constitutional tax and becomes an unconstitutional penalty.\textsuperscript{162} This may have made sense to the chief justice at the time, but it is hard to square with either the statutory text or the statutory purpose he described in \textit{King}.\textsuperscript{163}

159 Id.

160 Id. at 2595-96.

Roberts also took liberties with the ACA’s text in upholding the Medicaid expansion. Like six of his colleagues, the chief justice concluded that it was unconstitutional for Congress to condition a state’s receipt of all Medicaid funding on acceptance of the ACA’s Medicaid expansion.\textsuperscript{164} Leveraging longstanding state participation in the Medicaid program, and reliance upon significant federal support, was impermissibly coercive.

Rather than invalidate the Medicaid expansion in its entirety, however—let alone the ACA as a whole—the chief justice opted to rewrite the relevant ACA provisions to separate the old Medicaid program from the new. Although Congress had constructed the Medicaid expansion as an extension of the existing program by simply including the expansion among the conditions imposed on receipt of all Medicaid funds, the chief justice concluded that these were in fact two separate programs that states could consider separately. The relevant statutory language was effectively replicated, with one version continuing to set conditions on receipt of old Medicaid funds and another version incorporating the conditions of the Medicaid expansion. Here again, the chief justice’s opinion adopted an interpretation of the ACA at odds with the relevant statutory language in the name of a never-expressed congressional plan. Again, Roberts adopted an interpretation that undermined the purpose of the relevant provisions; since NFIB, dozens of states have declined to implement the ACA’s Medicaid expansion—which the ACA’s supporters clearly sought to ensure in all 50 states. By decoupling the Medicaid expansion from the continued receipt of traditional Medicaid funding, the chief justice made it much easier for states to refuse to participate in the expansion.

\textsuperscript{161} \textit{King}, 135 S. Ct. at 2486 (“Congress adopted a coverage requirement to ‘minimize this adverse selection and broaden the health insurance risk pool to include healthy individuals, which will lower health insurance premiums.’” (citing 42 U. S. C. § 18091(2) (I))).

\textsuperscript{163} Cf. \textit{King}, 135 S. Ct. at 2485–87.

\textsuperscript{164} \textit{NFIB}, 132 S. Ct. at 2601–07.

In NFIB the chief justice took liberties with the statutory text, even at the expense of statutory purpose, to prevent the ACA’s constitutional infirmities from dooming the statute. In King, he took liberties with the text to prevent the ACA’s political and operational infirmities from frustrating “Congress’s plan.” In so doing, the chief justice revealed that his willingness to stretch statutory text is not confined to cases of constitutional avoidance, and that providing a statute that “works” is as much a job for the courts as it is for Congress.

There is no indication in the statute or its legislative history that it was part of Congress’s plan to enact an inflexible tax rather than a flexible penalty; or to offer states a choice of either implementing the Medicaid expansion or preserving the status quo ante; or to make tax credits available in federal exchanges. The only “plan” that makes sense of Roberts’s saving constructions is a desire to prevent the ACA’s constitutional, political, and operational infirmities from threatening its survival.

PPACA proponents emphasized that the Medicaid expansion was not a new program, but a change to the existing Medicaid program, which every state had implemented. See Brief of Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, and Congressional Leaders and Leaders of Committees of Relevant Jurisdiction as Amici Curiae in Support of Respondents (Medicaid) at 6, NFIB v. Sebelius, 132 S. Ct. 2566, (2012) (No. 11-400). This is the only way to understand the purpose of the minimum income requirement for tax credit eligibility. See 26 U.S.C. § 36B.

See Noam N. Levey, Court’s Decision Could Widen Medicaid Gap, L.A. Times, June 29, 2012, available at http://articles.latimes.com/2012/jun/29/nation/lanacourt-impact-20120629; Stacey Butterfield, Changes to Medicaid Divide States, Doctors, ACP Internist (2013), http://www.acpinternist.org/archives/2013/10/medicaid.htm (quoting Sara Wilensky as saying “the toughest thing about Medicaid expansion, post-Supreme Court decision, is that what was supposed to be uniform across the country is now being decided on a state-by-state basis.”). As of July 20, 2105, 19 states had refused to expand Medicaid under the PPACA.
IX. Conclusion

Whether the members of Congress who supported the ACA were aware of it or not, “the most natural reading of the pertinent statutory phrase” shows they voted to present states with a choice. States could either create health insurance exchanges, in which case eligible citizens would receive tax credits, and many individuals and employers who failed to purchase coverage would face penalties, or states could choose not to create exchanges, in which case residents would receive no subsidies, but face fewer penalties. Like the choice Congress presented states via the Medicaid expansion, this choice was stark. No doubt few in Congress anticipated states would act like “separate and independent sovereigns” and “defend their prerogatives by adopting the simple expedient of not yielding to federal blandishments.”\(^{167}\) What makes the ACA unique is not that it offered states this sort of choice, but that a majority of states chose not to cooperate.

Chief Justice Roberts framed the Court’s \(\text{King}\) ruling as a service to “democracy.” “[I]n every case,” he wrote, the Court “must respect the role of the Legislature, and take care not to undo what it has done.”\(^{168}\) Yet that is precisely what the majority did. By elevating an unexpressed congressional plan over the plan Congress expressly laid out in statute, the majority altered the deal Congress offered states. Indeed, the Court went to great lengths to do so.

Reaching its conception of Congress’s plan required the majority to change the meaning of “established by the State” from its natural or plain meaning; to change the meaning of that phrase in some parts of the statute but not others; to treat a universal definition as conditional, and a conditional definition as universal; to conclude that Congress would allow adverse selection in long-term-care insurance, but not health insurance; to ignore that Congress indeed tolerated significant adverse selection in health insurance; to isolate select statutory text for the purpose of casting doubt on the operative text; to ignore all other text and context that eliminate such doubts; to rely on legislative history that supported its understanding of Congress’s plan, but ignore legislative history that supports the plain meaning; and to make broad assumptions about the way Congress legislates that are contrary to what we actually observe.

\(^{167}\) NFIB, 132 S. Ct. 2566, 2603 (2012) (internal quotation marks omitted).

\(^{168}\) King, 135 S. Ct. at 2496.

If it is “possible” to interpret “established by the State” to mean “established by the State or federal government,” are there any provisions of the ACA that cannot be rewritten to fulfill “what we see as Congress’s plan”? The ACA explicitly denies tax credits to those who purchase coverage outside of an exchange, to many dependents who do not have access to “affordable” employer coverage, and even to those with incomes below 100 percent of the poverty line, many of whom aren’t eligible for Medicaid. If “Congress’s plan” is simply to “improve health insurance markets,” should those limitations on tax-credit eligibility stand in the way? Should the IRS disregard all ACA provisions that limit eligibility for tax credits? Will the Court ratify those revisions of the statute?

These questions are not academic. The IRS has already expanded eligibility for tax credits to certain undocumented immigrants, individuals below 100 percent of the poverty line, and others in direct contravention of the clear limits imposed by Section 36B. Is pretending that 99 percent is greater than 100 percent also part of Congress’s plan? Those tax credits will trigger penalties against employers. Must those employers also pay taxes from which the ACA clearly exempts them?

The only answer the majority provides—the only limitation it envisions on the judicial power to override plain text in the service of “what we see as Congress’s plan”—is what is “at all possible.” That stands in stark contrast to the rule laid out by five of the six justices in the King majority just one year earlier:

This Court does not revise legislation...just because the text as written creates an apparent anomaly as to some subject it does not address. Truth be told, such anomalies often arise from statutes...Rejecting a similar argument that a statutory anomaly...made “not a whit of sense,” we explained in one recent case that “Congress wrote the statute it wrote”—

King v. Burwell and the Triumph of Selective Contextualism

meaning, a statute going so far and no further. . . . This Court has no roving license, in even ordinary cases of statutory interpretation, to disregard clear language simply on the view that . . . Congress “must have intended” something broader.171

It is also not much of a limitation. If judges may deprive select words of all meaning, construe select phrases to mean their opposite, ignore Congress’s express instructions, and treat text, context, legislative history, and a statute’s competing purposes as buffets from which they may select only the items that serve “what we see as Congress’s plan,” then judges will find very little is impossible. It remains to be seen whether this approach to statutory interpretation will be applied across the board, or is limited to the law “[w]e should start calling . . . SCOTUSCare.”172

The Court’s decision to disregard Congress’s express plan has deprived states of a power Congress granted them, and that many states were eager to use. It has altered the balance of power between the federal government and the states. It has reduced democratic accountability for the ACA, and perhaps other acts of Congress. It has subjected tens of millions of employers and individuals to penalties from which the ACA plainly exempts them.173 And it creates uncertainty about whether citizens can trust that federal statutes mean what they say.174

172 King, 135 S. Ct. at 2507 (Scalia, J., dissenting); see also id. at 2497 (“[N]ormal rules of interpretation seem always to yield to the overriding principle of the present Court: The Affordable Care Act must be saved.”). Cf. Ilya Shapiro, Scalia’s Obamacare Argument Is Stronger Than Roberts’, CNN.com, June 26, 2015, http://www.cnn.com/2015/06/26/opinions/shapiro-supreme-court-obamacare (“Scalia renamed the law at issue ‘SCOTUScare,’ but really it deserves the moniker RobertsCare.”).

174 See Star Wars supra note 1 (“This deal is getting worse all the time.”); see also Robot Chicken: Star Wars Episode II (Adult Swim broadcast, Nov. 16, 2008), https://youtu.be/WpE_xMRiCLE (illustrating the perils of post hoc deal alterations).