Revisionist Municipal Liability

Avidan Y. Cover
Case Western Reserve University School of Law, avidan.cover@case.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarlycommons.law.case.edu/faculty_publications

Part of the Torts Commons

Repository Citation
https://scholarlycommons.law.case.edu/faculty_publications/2016

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Case Western Reserve University School of Law Scholarly Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Publications by an authorized administrator of Case Western Reserve University School of Law Scholarly Commons.
Revisionist Municipal Liability

Avidan Y. Cover

Case Research Paper Series in Legal Studies
Working Paper 2017-22
December 2017

This paper can be downloaded without charge from the Social Science Research Network Electronic Paper Collection:
https://ssrn.com/abstract=3083592

For a complete listing of this series:
http://www.law.case.edu/ssrn
REVISIONIST MUNICIPAL LIABILITY

Avidan Y. Cover*

The current constitutional torts system under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 affords little relief to victims of government wrongdoing. Victims of police brutality seeking accountability and compensation from local police departments find their remedies severely limited because the municipal liability doctrine demands plaintiffs meet near-impossible standards of proof relating to policies and causation.

The article provides a revisionist historical account of the Supreme Court’s municipal liability doctrine’s origins. Most private litigants’ claims for damages against cities or police departments do not implicate the doctrine’s early federalism concerns over protracted federal judicial interference with local governance. Meanwhile the federal government imposes extensive reforms on local police departments through the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act, 42 U.S.C. § 14141. The resulting system of bifurcated municipal liability for police misconduct ignores history. It permits government-initiated systemic, injunctive relief claims to flow readily, but effectively bans individual victims’ discrete damages claims.

The article proposes making it easier to sue local governments for police brutality. Reducing the standard for damages relief does not offend federalism principles and realizes objectives critical to the constitutional remedial system: compensation, trust, vindication of rights, and appropriate assignment of responsibility. The article proposes a remedial scheme authorizing civil actions for police brutality victims against local governments for (1) a pattern or practice of local government police misconduct, and (2) isolated instances where a local police department lacks a policy, of which there is national consensus by other local departments that the policy is necessary to prevent a particular constitutional harm. The proposal also expands the potential for individual officer liability when the local police department has a specific policy in place aimed at preventing wrongdoing that the officer ignores.

Municipal liability is practically a dead letter. The Supreme Court’s jurisprudence in this area is two-faced at best. In one breath, the Court invokes the availability of a remedy for holding local governments accountable for unconstitutional conduct like systemic police brutality, while constructing standards so impossibly high that rarely, if ever, may an aggrieved person establish municipal liability. It has been almost thirty years since the Court found that a local “policy caused an unconstitutional violation.”1 This anemic municipal liability frustrates the Court’s purported

* Professor of Law, Case Western Reserve University School of Law. My grateful thanks to the Southeastern Association of Law Schools New Scholars Workshop participants and University of Pittsburgh School of Law Junior balancing of the protection of individual constitutional rights—through compensation and deterrence of misconduct—and the guardianship of local autonomy. Moreover, the doctrine is part of a parsimonious constitutional tort adjudication system that, through qualified immunity, also generally denies police brutality victims a remedy against government employees.

Because the bulk of people’s encounters with law enforcement involve local officers, the limited civil remedy against local governments and their agents is particularly troubling. Most members of the public have little occasion to defensively invoke constitutional protections by, for example, suppressing unlawfully obtained evidence. People also will rarely seek prospective relief, enjoining police from a particular offensive practice. An expanded conception of municipal liability, which also significantly truncates the interrelated qualified immunity doctrine, is therefore required so that police brutality victims may obtain the chief constitutional civil remedy—damages.

Though proposals to reform police practices abound, there has been little focus on the singular importance of securing compensation. Current municipal liability doctrine does not distinguish forms of relief, precluding damages claims based on reasoning that, I argue, draws on inapposite concerns over equitable remedies entangling federal courts in local governance.

Faculty workshop participants for their comments on drafts of this paper. My particular thanks to Lauryn Gouldin and David A. Harris for their helpful insights.

3 See generally Avidan Y. Cover, Reconstructing the Right Against Excessive Force, 68 FLORIDA L. REV. 1773 (2016) (describing how qualified immunity doctrine and excessive force case law work together to limit § 1983 remedy). The various other constitutional torts doctrines all favor government actors as well. Sovereign immunity insulates state governments from damages liability for constitutional violations. Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1 (1890). See also Will
v. Mich. Dep’t of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 71 (1989) (holding that “person” in § 1983 does not include states and state agencies). And judicially crafted causes of action afford meager accountability for individual federal law enforcement officers’ constitutional wrongdoing. Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S.Ct. 1843 (2017). The Supreme Court’s rigorous pleadings standards further discourage productive effective civil actions against government actors. Ashcroft 4 Though other forms of government misconduct also may merit changes to government immunity law, police brutality uniquely justifies expansion of local government liability because of the public’s frequent, often involuntary, and physical interactions with officers that may merge into harassment, profiling, searches, seizure, and violence. See
LYNN LANGDON & MATTHEW DUROSE, BUREAU OF JUSTICE STATISTICS, U.S. DEP’T OF JUSTICE, POLICE BEHAVIOR (accessed Aug. 13, 2017) (finding that 62.9 million U.S. residents, 16 years or older, had at least one contact with police in 2011, and that half of those people had an involuntary experience with police).
6 Bivens, 403 U.S. at 410 (Harlan, J., concurring); Wells, supra note 5, at 1051.
7 See, e.g., ANGELA J. DAVIS, POLICING THE BLACK MAN: ARREST, PROSECUTION, AND IMPRISONMENT (2017) (addressing important areas including openly discussing the country’s violent racial past, reforming racial disparities in sentencing, policing of black males, ending racial profiling, implicit bias instruction, improving police and community relations, and prosecutorial and grand jury reforms); FINAL REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT’S TASK FORCE ON need for changes in policies and procedures due to fatal police shootings throughout the country); infra Part II (discussing police structural reform litigation proposals relating to 42 U.S.C. § 14141).
A textbook account might draw the birth and evolution of municipal liability in linear fashion. But like any good origins story, the details are murkier. The Court first disavowed municipal liability in 1971 based on its reading of 42 U.S.C. § 1983’s legislative history in Monroe v. Pape. Only seventeen years later, the Court reversed itself in Monell v. Dep’t of Soc. Servs., offering a wholly different reading of the legislative history. Yet in breathing life into municipal liability, Monell reflects much ambivalence about the remedy.

Although the Monell Court upheld a municipal liability claim, it added the caveats that a constitutional violation must be tied to a policy or custom and that liability does not attach through respondeat superior. The subsequent near-four decades have seen evolution and refinement of these caveats, which tend to limit municipal liability though stringent causation and culpability standards. In particular, plaintiffs must establish that a municipality’s “deliberate action . . . is the ‘moving force’” causing the deprivation of federal rights. Plaintiffs also must demonstrate that a municipality acted with deliberate indifference to a “plainly obvious” risk that its action will violate the federal right at issue.

Commentators and the Court have generally attributed Monell’s parsimonious municipal liability bent to a concern for federalism that is easily traced back to the Monroe to Monell to post-Monell progeny line. In its invocation of federalism, the Court also stresses the negative financial effects that the damages from an expansive municipal liability would visit on local governments.

This article’s revisionist historical approach, however, reveals that the above narrative is falsely circumscribed. The prevailing narrative ignores the Court’s earlier concerns over structural reform litigation and civil rights injunctions that were at issue in the 1960s and 1970s. Under a revisionist analysis, today’s municipal liability doctrine may be better explained by the Court’s unspoken and sublimated anxieties over impact litigation that sought systematic reforms under federal judicial supervision.

Most lawsuits asserting municipal liability are more modest in their aims, often seeking only damages or discrete equitable relief, rather than institutional upheaval. These limited actions serve the vital purpose of compensating victims of unconstitutional municipal policies, practices, and customs. Permitting the public to bring more constitutional tort damages claims against local governments also supports principles of procedural justice and civil recourse, empowering community members, vindicating constitutional rights against wrongdoers, and fostering trust in courts’ fairness.

---

11 Id. at 411.
It is specifically these more modest damages claims that should not be essentially barred on the same federalism grounds that are animated by systematic structural reform litigation efforts. These damages actions do not implicate the same federalism concerns.

Failing to appreciate the animating rationales of municipal liability can lead to anomalous legal remedial schemes. The current judicial and statutory framework for addressing police brutality offers a useful example. The decline of municipal liability as an avenue for limited judicial relief from police brutality led, in part, to a surge in structural reform litigation and police reform spurred by the federal executive via its congressionally-created 42 U.S.C. § 14141 authority.

These reforms have led to welcome and significant improvements in police training, use of force, and accountability in several police departments across the nation. But resource constraints and political considerations often limit the scope of reform. Moreover, parties involved in § 14141 litigation often fail to sufficiently engage the local community—particularly police misconduct victims—in the reform process. Finally, § 14141 is solely prospective in its remedial reach, affording no compensation to victims of police brutality.

Despite the limited ambit of § 14141 structural reform litigation, the inevitably intrusive nature of these actions stands in stark contrast to the banner of federalism that the Court has invoked for some forty years in rejecting various individual lawsuits asserting municipal liability. To be sure, Congress granted the federal executive the authority to intercede in light of the Court’s skepticism of judicially authorized institutional litigation and reforms. But the authority would appear to contravene the Court’s concern over federal intrusion on local law enforcement prerogatives. This article addresses whether the principles of federalism would be less offended were individuals granted more fulsome damages remedies in the form of more expansive municipal liability.

Moreover, ensuring municipal liability’s vitality is particularly necessary in any era where the federal executive is not inclined to pursue § 14141 actions. The Trump administration has, for example, indicated it will not pursue litigation against local police agencies for excessive force and other constitutional violations, suggesting it may even undo consent decrees entered pursuant to § 14141. Where police department accountability may so readily become a casualty of politicization, the individual damages lawsuit should not be so easily precluded by restrictive judicially imposed standards resting on an inapposite federalism rationale.

---

15 Attorney General Jeffrey Sessions’s memo to Justice Department officials suggests that the federal government’s local law enforcement reform efforts may cease with the Trump administration, owing to some of these very federalism concerns. Memo from Att’y Gen. Jeffrey B. Sessions to Heads of Dep’t Components and U.S. Att’ys, Re: Supporting Federal, State, Local and Tribal Law Enforcement (March 31, 2017), https://assets.documentcloud.org/documents/3535148/Consentdecreebaltimore.pdf, [hereinafter Sessions Memo]. Attorney General Sessions called for a review of local law enforcement reform efforts, including “existing or contemplated consent decrees” based, in part, on the principle that “[l]ocal control and local accountability are necessary for effective local policing. It is not the responsibility of the federal government to manage non-federal law enforcement agencies.” Id.
Adopting a more contextualized—or revisionist—history of municipal liability, should liberate the Court to revisit its municipal liability jurisprudence. After all this is a mess that the Court has made. But the Court has proven so wedded to fending off attempts to secure compensatory damages for government wrongdoing that any hope for a more permissive municipal liability damages standard lies with the Legislative branch. To the Congress’ credit, it did, at least, address the Judiciary’s errors regarding equitable relief with its structural reform legislation. Now it should finish the job concerning damages liability.

Part I of this article charts the origins of the Monell standard and revisits the legitimacy of the federalism concerns that purportedly animate the restrictive causation requirement for municipal liability under § 1983. Part II addresses one legislative effort—§ 14141—to address some of the Court’s jurisprudence that limited the public and the government’s efforts to secure police reforms. The section also explores the shortcomings in § 14141, particularly from a democratic and compensatory perspective, as well as the significant federalism issues the law raises.

Part III argues that, because the Court’s federalism concerns were motivated by the invasive nature of prospective relief, damages claims merit a diminished standard of liability. The section lays out how the history and nature of damages relief also merit a lesser showing for municipal liability. The section further demonstrates that a more available damages remedy from local governments for police abuses will foster victim compensation, improve the public’s trust in the legal system, vindicate constitutional rights, and better affix responsibility for wrongdoing.

Finally, Part IV proposes a legislative framework for assessing municipal liability claims seeking only damages relief. The remedial scheme authorizes two civil actions for police brutality victims against local governments for (1) a pattern or practice of local government police misconduct, and (2) isolated instances where a local police department lacks a policy, of which there is national consensus by other local departments that the policy is necessary to prevent a particular constitutional harm. The proposal also expands potential individual officer liability when the local police department has a specific policy in place aimed at preventing wrongdoing that the officer ignores. The section concludes by examining both the strengths and weaknesses of the proposed framework.
I. Revising Monell

A. Monroe v. Pape

At the outset of the rebirth of § 1983 as a constitutional remedy in 1961, the Supreme Court’s resistance to municipal liability was distinguished by ostensible alarm over monetary damages’ debilitating financial impact on local governments. In Monroe v. Pape, the Supreme Court addressed a § 1983 lawsuit alleging the abusive treatment by Chicago police officers, which sought damages against both the officers and the city of Chicago. The Court established for the first time that local government officials could be held liable for constitutional violations under § 1983. Yet the Court also held that municipalities enjoy immunity from liability, reasoning that Congress had not intended municipalities to fall within the scope of § 1983.

The Court relied on the legislative history of the civil rights action precursor to § 1983. The Court construed the 42nd Congress’s rejection of the Sherman Amendment to the 1871 Ku Klux Klan Act, “which would have made ‘the inhabitants of the county, city, or parish’ in which certain acts of violence occurred liable ‘to pay full compensation’ to the person damaged or his widow or legal representative,” as “so antagonistic” to preclude a reading of “person” within § 1983 to include a municipal corporation.

Monroe might have been viewed—as its author, Justice William Douglas believed—as divining congressional intent to limit the costly and paralyzing effects of municipal liability for only damages relief. But the Court eventually held in 1973 in City of Kenosha v. Bruno that § 1983 also prohibits claims for declaratory and equitable relief.

B. Monell v. Dep’t of Soc. Servs.

Seventeen years after Monroe, the Court overturned its holding as to municipal liability in Monell v. Dep’t of Soc. Servs., reinterpreting the 1871 Act’s legislative history to permit lawsuits against local governments. The Court held that the plaintiffs in Monell were entitled to monetary relief in the form of retrospective back pay based on a New York City agency’s “official policy” requiring pregnant employees to take unpaid leave.

---

16 365 U.S. at 169.
17 Id. at 172.
18 Id. at 187.
19 Id. at 188.
20 Id. at 191.
21 Id. at 191-92.
22 City of Kenosha, Wis. v. Bruno, 412 U.S. 507, 516 (1973) (Douglas, J., dissenting in part); id. at 517 (Appendix) (attributing the rejection of the Sherman Amendment to “the notion that civil liability for damages might destroy or paralyze local governments”).
23 City of Kenosha, Wis. v. Bruno, 412 U.S. 507, 513 (1973) (holding that municipal corporations “are outside of [§ 1983’s] ambit for purposes of equitable relief as well as for damages”).
24 436 U.S. at 691.
25 Id. at 661-62. Though the relief sought was monetary, the plaintiffs did not bring “a damage suit against the city itself, but instead an equitable action brought against particular officials in their official capacity asking them to use establishing liability, however, including requiring that a constitutional violation be tied to a policy or custom and that a municipality could not be held vicariously liable for its employees’ conduct.26

The Court’s decision can be viewed as startling, in part because it ran counter to principles of stare decisis. Monell also was a product of, and response to, the Court’s contradictory patchwork of recent cases upholding and striking down civil lawsuits seeking broad institutional reforms. It was a compromise. While purporting to authorize lawsuits against local governments, the standards it imposed reflected the Court’s ambivalence, if not (growing) hostility toward federal civil rights injunctions.

Coinciding with the Warren Court era, impact litigation reaped a number of successes particularly in reforming school segregation and prison conditions.27 Expansive federal judicial decrees in the 1950s and 1960s required that “forward-looking, affirmative steps be taken to prevent future deprivations.”28 These cases generally involved intricate prospective remedies rather than simple damages. But over the next decade, structural reform through litigation received substantial criticism.29 The transition to the Burger Court saw a disenchantment with federal judicial supervision of local government functions and a scaling back and undoing of desegregation decrees and rejection of challenges to prison conditions.30

It was into these cross-currents of the law that the Court confronted Monroe’s prohibition on municipal liability. Justice William Brennan’s majority opinion in Monell relied on a revised reading of legislative history to overturn the bar on municipal liability. Brennan’s revisionist legislative history was prompted by the Court’s irreconcilable holdings that Monroe and its progeny precluded municipal liability and that school boards could still be sued under § 1983.

At stake was the Court’s post-Brown v. Board of Education desegregation project. In addition to citing “over a score of cases”31 that the Court decided on school board liability, which sat uncomfortably alongside Monroe,32 Brennan’s majority opinion interpreted congressional 26 Monell, 436 U.S. at 691.

---

28 Id. at 1392. See, e.g., Brown v. Bd. of Education (Brown II), 349 U.S. 294, 300 (1955) (directing district courts to follow “equitable principles” in “fashioning and effectuating” desegregation decrees).
30 Gilles, Reinventing Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 27 at 1393-95.
31 Monell, 436 U.S. at 663, 663 n.5.
32 Id. at 695-96. See also id. at 696 (“Thus, while we have reaffirmed Monroe without further examination on three occasions, it can scarcely be said that Monroe is so consistent with the warp and woof of civil rights law as to be beyond question.”).
actions to reflect legislative approval of federal judicial supervision of local school districts with some costs payed by local governments.

In his concurrence, Justice Lewis Powell more explicitly characterized the school board and Monroe line of cases as impossibly inconsistent. Powell observed that the Court had not prohibited official-capacity school board cases that included damages claims, thereby implicitly recognizing municipal damages liability. He also rejected proposals that would bifurcate municipal liability based on the nature of the requested relief and thus permit only equitable claims under § 1983. Powell noted the Court’s rejection of such a dual approach in Kenosha. Finally, Powell argued that expansion of municipal liability under § 1983 was necessary or else the Court’s recent Bivens cause of action under the Fourteenth Amendment might have to be broadened to encompass claims against local governments.

The Court’s ambivalence over municipal liability—particularly its potential for solidifying and increasing burdensome lawsuits and federal court supervision of local government agencies that had been ushered in with Brown—help explain the compromised nature of Monell and its policy and causation requirement. Indeed, the Court foreshadowed these concerns two years earlier in its 1976 opinion, Rizzo v. Goode, which struck down a court order requiring extensive Philadelphia police department reforms. Rizzo emphasized the sensitivity with which the Court regards federal injunctions against local government and demanded a direct causal link between a plan or policy and unconstitutional conduct.

Even though the Monell plaintiffs only sought back pay for their unconstitutional department-imposed pregnancy leaves, the Court adopted the very same rules for establishing liability articulated in Rizzo. To better understand Monell, we must revisit Rizzo.

C. Rizzo v. Goode

33 Id. at 696-99 (inferring legislative approval of municipal liability from, in part, Congress’ rejecting federal court stripping efforts, providing funds to assist school districts in complying with decrees, and authorizing civil rights attorney fees awards).
34 Id. at 710-11 (Powell, J., concurring) (“This line of cases—from Monroe to Kenosha—is difficult to reconcile on a principled basis with a parallel series of cases in which the Court has assumed sub silentio that some local government entities could be sued under § 1983.”); id. at 711 (warning that maintaining Monroe’s holding would “cast . . . grave doubt” on Court’s § 1983 school board litigation). Both in dissent and in memorandums, Justice Rehnquist invoked stare decisis and disputed the inconsistency or “confusion” of Monroe and the school board cases, contending that the lines of cases have made clear the distinction. See 436 U.S. at 714-17 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting); Justice William H. Rehnquist, Memorandum to the Conference (Rough Draft), No. 76-1914, Monell v. Department of Social Services, 7-9, March 6, 1978
35 Id.
36 Id.
37 Id.
38 Id.
40 See infra Part I.D.
Rizzo is not, formally, a municipal liability case. But the Rizzo litigation amounts to a municipal liability case in everything but name. Individuals and groups on behalf of all Philadelphia residents and black residents brought two consolidated class actions against the mayor, police commissioner, and other city officials. The suits sought equitable remedies based on a “pervasive pattern of illegal and unconstitutional mistreatment by police officers” targeting minorities but affecting all city residents. The Court characterized the claims against the city officials as alleging “express authorization or encouragement of [ ] mistreatment [and] failure to act in a manner so as to assure that it would not recur in the future.”

The trial concerned 40 incidents of alleged police misconduct, and entailed 21 days of hearings consisting of 250 witnesses. As relief, the district court ordered “a comprehensive program” for addressing civilian complaints, subject to guidelines on revising police manuals of procedures concerning civilian interaction, including limits on racial bias, offensive language, and searches; complaint processing; forms; and adjudication of complaints.

The Supreme Court’s decision presaged Monell’s policy requirement for municipal liability. Writing for the 6-3 majority, Justice William Rehnquist held the lower courts’ equitable relief improper, rejecting liability based on a pattern of misconduct by police officers because there was no showing of a causal link to the defendants’ actions, i.e., policies or plans. The Court distinguished the desegregation cases, Brown and Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, in which school board members and administrators had been ordered to integrate schools because those officials had affirmatively denied equal protection to minority students.

The case came down to concerns over federalism and the scope of the federal courts’ equitable power. Indeed, the Rizzo opinion suggests that courts should be skeptical of claimants seeking equitable relief under § 1983. The case was in large measure about the role that courts should have in overseeing police department operations. Or, as the Court later phrased it, whether “[t]he scope of federal equity power . . . should be extended to the fashioning of prophylactic

---

41 To some extent, Rizzo was simply a supervisory liability case, in which the Court held that officials could not be held liable under § 1983 unless they actually directed the constitutional violation. 423 U.S. at 384 (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (“The Court today appears to assert that a state official is not subject to the structures of 42 U.S.C. s 1983 unless he directs the deprivation of constitutional rights.”).
42 Id. at 364 n.1.
43 Id. at 366-67.
44 Id. at 367.
45 Id.
46 Id. at 369-70.
47 Id. at 374 (contrasting with facts of Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939); Allee v. Medrano, 416 U.S. 802, 812, 814-15 (1974)). The Court might have dispensed with the case on just one of the grounds that it raised in its opinion. For example, the Court determined that the plaintiffs lacked standing because the relief they sought was too “attenuated” given that they sought changes in police procedures and had not named the police officers who might act unlawfully against them due to inadequate guidance. 423 U.S. at 372.
48 Id. 376-77 (discussing 402 U.S. 1 (1971); 347 U.S. 483 (1954)).
49 See id. at 378 (“Section 1983 by its terms confers authority to grant equitable relief as well as damages, but its words ‘allow a suit in equity only when that is the proper proceeding for redress . . .’” (quoting Giles v. Harris, 189 U.S. 475, 486 (1903) (Holmes, J.)).
50 See id. at 369.
procedures for a state agency designed to minimize this kind of misconduct on the part of a handful of its employees.” 51 The Court held that the injunctive relief requiring a revision of the police department’s manual on procedures relating to civilians “was indisputably a sharp limitation on the department’s ‘latitude in the dispatch of its own internal affairs.’” 52 Focusing on the equitable nature of the relief, the Court stressed the need to consider federalism in weighing the propriety of the remedy. 53 The Court ultimately held that the district court’s injunctive decree had “departed from these precepts” of federalism, which included restraining federal courts’ intrusion of their equitable powers into state administration of law. 54 Dissenting, Justice Harry Blackmun agreed with the “abstract principle” that federal judicial involvement in local police operation is “undesirable”, but contended that § 1983 was intended to cover inaction leading to the violation of constitutional rights. 55

Just four years later in United States v. Philadelphia, the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit rejected the federal government’s efforts to secure very similar reforms of the Philadelphia police department. 56 Relying in part on federalism principles, the Third Circuit held that the United States lacked standing to pursue claims enjoining Philadelphia Police Department officials from systematic civil rights violations. 57 Philadelphia residents no longer had a judicial remedy to stop their own police from brutalizing them.

D. Revisiting Monell

Monell’s policy requirement for municipal liability, insisting on a causal relationship between the constitutional violation and a municipal policy, relies almost entirely on Rizzo. The Court cites Rizzo for the proposition that liability hinges on causation and “that Congress did not intend § 1983 liability to attach where such causation was absent.” 58 Brennan’s second draft of the opinion relies even more heavily on Rizzo, employing it to illustrate the principle that blame or fault of the local government must be demonstrated to fall within the scope of § 1983. 59 In a draft

51 Id. at 378.
52 Id. at 379 (citation omitted).
53 Id. at 378 (“Where, as here, the exercise of authority by state officials is attacked, federal courts must be constantly mindful of the ‘special delicacy of the adjustment to be preserved between equitable power and State administration of its own law.’” (quoting Stefanelli v. Minard, 342 U.S. 117, 120 (1951)). See id. at 379 (“[A]ppropriate consideration must be given to principles of federalism in determining the availability and scope of equitable relief.”) (citing Doran v. Salem Inn, Inc., 422 U.S. 922, 928 (1975)).
54 Id. at 378, 379-80 (citing O’Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 502 (1974)).
55 Id. at 381-82 (Blackmun, J., dissenting).
56 644 F.2d 187 (3d Cir. 1980).
57 Id.
58 436 U.S. at 692; see also id. at 694 (“By our decision in Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362, 96 S.Ct. 598, 46 L.Ed.2d 561 (1976), we would appear to have decided that the mere right to control without any control or direction having been exercised and without any failure to supervise is not enough to support § 1983 liability.”); Rizzo, 423 U.S. at 370-71 (“The plain words of [§ 1983] impose liability whether in the form of payment of redressive damages or being placed under an injunction only for conduct which ‘subjects, or causes to be subjected’ the complainant to a deprivation of a right secured by the Constitution and laws.”).
59 Monell v. Dep’t of Soc. Servs. of City of New York, No. 75-1914, 2d Opinion Draft, William J. Brennan, Jr., Opinion, 33 n. 59 (April 24, 1978) (“For example, in Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362 (1976), we recognized that fault is a crucial factor in determining whether relief may run against a party for its alleged participation in an unconstitutional tort.”), available at footnote Brennan quotes at length the Rizzo Court’s distinguishing of the Swann and Brown’s school board roles in affirmatively directing unconstitutional conduct in the desegregation cases. In order to bring Justices on board, however, Brennan sought to avoid any appearance that negligence could establish municipal liability. Brennan therefore removed all references to “fault” throughout the opinion that would so imply, resulting in the removal of the entire footnote and quote from Rizzo. Though the Rizzo footnote was ultimately left on the printing floor, the opinion’s imprint on Monell and municipal liability is unmistakable.

What has received little attention is that the Rizzo interpretation of § 1983, which Monell adopted, was predicated on a case involving systemic injunctive relief—federal court intervention in local policing efforts. In adopting the Rizzo test, Monell also adopted Rizzo’s reasoning, namely federalism concerns, interests that may not always be implicated by municipal liability claims limited to damages relief.

The holdings of Rizzo cannot be separated from the underlying facts of the case, and, in particular, the relief sought. The Rizzo majority formulated a rigorous causation standard for § 1983 liability based on facts that, as it perceived them, involved very few allegations of misconduct, were not authorized or approved by defendants, and concerned a dispute between “the entire citizenry of Philadelphia and the petitioning elected and appointed officials” over police procedures. The sought-after-relief amounted to an “overhaul[ ]” of police policies and practices.

61 The Court was certainly conscious, however, of the potential financial impact on local governments’ treasuries caused by lifting the bar on municipal liability. Transcript of Oral Argument at 26-27, Monell v. Dep’t of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658 (1978) (No. 75-1914), available at http://www1.law.umkc.edu/justicepapers/monellDocs/z Other Source pdfs Monell/Monell Oral Argument Transcript (v2).pdf. Indeed, in his dissent, Justice Rehnquist addresses solely the economic consequences on local governments’ treasuries of lifting the bar on municipal liability. Monell, 436 U.S. at 724 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting) (“[T]he doctrine of municipal immunity enunciated in Monroe has protected municipalities and their limited treasuries from the consequences of their officials’ failure to predict the course of this Court’s constitutional jurisprudence.”). See also Achtenberg, Frankfurter’s Champion, supra note 25, at 687 (describing the view that Monell was “an ad hoc political compromise” possibly “motivated by concern about the perilous financial condition of some cities”).

62 423 U.S. at 371. Acknowledging the federalism concerns, Blackmun sought to minimize the remedy’s intrusive aspects. He contended that the “remedy was one evolved with the defendant officials’ assent.” Id. at 381 (Blackmun, J., dissenting).

63 423 U.S. at 373. The remedy, Blackmun argued, was not overly burdensome, was efficient, would improve the system, and reduce constitutional violations. Id. at 381 (Blackmun, J., dissenting).
David Jacks Achtenberg offers an alternative explanation of the Monell outcome. Achtenberg contends that the Court’s municipal liability doctrine was a compromise owing to Justice Powell’s concern that “Monroe so severely imbalanced the structure of federalism that he would be willing to overrule it despite his normal concern for stare decisis.”64 Monell thus reifies Justice Frankfurter’s seventeen-year-old-dissenting viewpoint in Monroe that liability should only follow where “the wrongdoer’s conduct was actually authorized by state or local law.”65 Whether municipal liability may be traced in part to Frankfurter’s “color of law” theory, Monell’s municipal ultimately rests on case law—Rizzo—addressing structural reform litigation and injunctive relief’s perceived departure from “the principles of federalism,”66 the effects of which are still felt today.

Even accepting my interpretation, Monell did in fact overrule Monroe, permitting lawsuits against municipalities to go forward. Some of this may be attributable to the Court’s necessary endorsement of judicially imposed desegregation. Justifying its departure from Monroe and its ban on municipal liability, the Court relied in part on the fact that school boards were still held liable in desegregation litigation and that Congress had continued to support this state of affairs.67

Monell also explicitly and implicitly embraces a municipal liability remedy that encompasses all forms of relief. The Court expressly stated that “[l]ocal governing bodies [ ] can be sued directly under § 1983 for monetary, declaratory, or injunctive relief.”68 And the Court’s positive citation of federal school desegregation decrees reflected additional approval of injunctive relief.69 The Court’s opinion, however, might be best viewed as at once theoretically endorsing the school board structural reform line of cases while complicating future implementation of the holding by designing such demanding policy or custom and causation standards.

Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun, all of whom had dissented in Rizzo, may have considered relying on that opinion’s high causation standard in Monell as a necessary concession in order to cobble a majority. But the adoption of Rizzo as the municipal liability standard makes Monell a pyrrhic civil rights victory. Rizzo’s skepticism of federal court intervention, sounding in federalism, looms over every municipal liability case, even when these concerns are not significant or necessarily implicated.

E. City of Los Angeles v. Lyons

The Court made clear its concern over municipal liability and invasive equitable remedies when in 1983 it struck down an order enjoining the Los Angeles Police Department from authorizing chokeholds. City of Los Angeles v. Lyons does not explicitly address the contours of

---

65 Achtenberg, Frankfurter’s Champion, supra note 25, at 682.
68 Id. at 690.
69 Id. at 696-99.
the causation policy standard. It is, nominally, a case concerning standing for injunctive relief. Yet it elevates the pleading standard for equitable claims in contrast to damages claims, and echoes the federalism concerns expressed in Rizzo, notwithstanding the less intrusive relief requested in Lyons. As a result, it has significantly impacted the development of municipal liability.

In City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, the Supreme Court addressed a preliminary injunction against the city, prohibiting the use of chokeholds except when the suspect reasonably appears to be an immediate and deadly threat. Adolph Lyons alleged that, in connection with a traffic stop and without any provocation, Los Angeles police placed him in a chokehold, rendering him unconscious and damaging his larynx. Lyons further alleged that city policy authorized chokeholds where there is no threat of deadly force and that, as a result, many people had been injured. The Court ultimately overturned the injunction, holding that Lyons lacked standing to bring the claim because his injury did not evidence a “real and immediate threat” that he would be stopped again by police and that they would unlawfully choke him. In denying standing, the Court narrowly read Lyons’ complaint, finding that the allegation that chokeholds were authorized in less-than-deadly-force situations did not amount to a policy of chokeholds without provocation.

Lyons addresses arguments whether the nature of the relief requested should influence the legal analysis, specifically the case or controversy standard. The Court rejected the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit’s approach that imposes lesser standards where discrete injunctive relief is sought, as opposed to the massive structural reform pursued in cases like Rizzo. Addressing equitable relief standards, the Court maintained that courts should exercise restraint in light of federalism concerns. But the Court also applied a more exacting standing standard for the equitable relief as opposed to the damages relief threshold.

Justice Marshall took issue with the bifurcated approach. Dissenting, he contended that the city’s chokehold policy should suffice for purposes of both equitable and damages liability.
Similar to the Ninth Circuit, Marshall also argued that the nature of the equitable relief should impact the federalism assessment. He distinguished Lyons as a case seeking only a preliminary injunction concerning limited relief, whereas in Rizzo, at issue was a permanent injunction involving comprehensive reforms. 81

Lyons essentially closed the door on private civil lawsuits seeking structural reform. 82 Though not framed in terms of § 1983, the Court’s stringent case or controversy requirement for injunctive relief could just as easily be replaced with Monell’s policy-causation requirement. Marshall lamented that the decision left victims of systematic police violence with “only an award of damages.” 83 But the Court’s subsequent municipal liability jurisprudence renders Marshall’s comment—sadly—overly optimistic.

F. Monell’s Legacy

Over the past thirty years, Monell’s promise of municipal liability has proven to be a paper tiger. The Court has only developed a set of stricter requirements to establish municipal liability. David Jacks Achtenberg complains that the doctrine’s exceedingly high and “idiosyncratically protective” standards exceed those prescribed for private employers, negligent selection of independent contractors, non-constitutional torts, and even damages against private employers. 84 Peter Schuck similarly criticizes the Court for unfaithfully and inconsistently applying private tort law concepts to municipal liability. 85 He also takes to task the Court’s “official policy” test and causation standards for failing to appreciate the invariable “causal nexus between agency and injury.” 86 Moreover, terms such as “policy” and “policymaker” are so ill-defined as to “bear[ ] only a superficial resemblance to the type of public agency at which § 1983 claims are typically directed.” 87

The Rizzo-influenced federalism concerns pervade the Court’s opinions limiting municipal liability, notwithstanding the fact that virtually all these cases address only damages claims. In addition, many of these cases echo Rizzo’s lingering dispute over when or whether single instances

---

81 Id. at 133-34 (“The modest interlocutory relief granted in this case differs markedly, however, from the intrusive injunction involved in Rizzo, and simply does not implicate the federalism concerns that arise when a federal court undertakes to ‘supervise the functioning of the police department.’”) (quoting Rizzo, 423 U.S. at 380 (Blackmun, J., dissenting)).

82 See Gilles, Reinventing Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 27, at 1386.

83 Lyons, 461 U.S. at 137 (Marshall, J., dissenting).

85 Schuck, supra note 64, at 1763.

86 Id. at 1764-65. See also John C. Jeffries, Jr., The Liability Rules for Constitutional Torts, 99 VA. L. REV. 207, 236 (2013) (characterizing the legal standards for identifying official policy or custom as “radically indeterminate”) [hereinafter Jeffries, Jr., Liability Rules].

87 Schuck, supra note 64, at 1775-78.
of misconduct amount to a systematic problem, which could evince municipal liability.\textsuperscript{88} The federalism-influenced debate over what amounts to a sufficiently obvious or systematic problem suffuses the Court’s treatment of “failure to train” and “failure to review” damages cases.

In 1989, the Court held in \textit{City of Canton, Ohio v. Harris} that a local government’s failure to train police officers on the use of deadly force could establish municipal liability because violent encounters are sufficiently predictable as to render a lack of training deliberately indifferent.\textsuperscript{89} But as with \textit{Monell}, the promise of \textit{Harris} is illusory. The Court stressed the need for a significant standard of fault in failure to train claims, relying on both \textit{Monell} and \textit{Rizzo}.\textsuperscript{90} A failure to train claim will only meet the § 1983 “policy or custom” standard if it amounts to “deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [untrained employees] come into contact.”\textsuperscript{91} Lack of training could only be characterized as policy where the “need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights.”\textsuperscript{92}

The \textit{Harris} Court explained that a lesser standard would violate \textit{Monell}’s strictures, amounting to “de facto respondeat superior liability.”\textsuperscript{93} The Court cited \textit{Rizzo} for its federalism argument, contending that a lesser standard “would also engage the federal courts in an endless exercise of second-guessing municipal employee-training programs. This is an exercise we believe the federal courts are ill suited to undertake, as well as one that would implicate serious questions of federalism.”\textsuperscript{94}

Eight years later, in \textit{Board of County Commissioners of Bryan County v. Brown}, the Court held that a county’s alleged failure to properly review an applicant deputy sheriff’s history could not render the county liable for the deputy sheriff’s excessive force.\textsuperscript{95} The Court held that a thorough background check would not have turned up information suggesting the likelihood that he would use excessive force during his employment.\textsuperscript{96} The lack of a causal connection meant that the county was not deliberately indifferent to the risk of a constitutional violation. Though no injunctive relief was sought, the Court again adopted the mantle of protecting local government autonomy from federal-judicial intrusion: “A failure to apply stringent culpability and causation requirements raises serious federalism concerns, in that it risks constitutionalizing particular hiring requirements that States have themselves elected not to impose.”\textsuperscript{97}

In its most recent, extensive discussion of municipal liability in 2011, the Court held that the Orleans Parish District Attorney’s Office was not liable for district attorneys’ failure to disclose

\begin{itemize}
  \item See \textit{Howard M. Wasserman, Understanding Civil Rights Litigation} 135 (2013).
  \item \textit{489 U.S. 378} (1989).
  \item Id. at 391-92.
  \item Id. at 388-89.
  \item Id. at 390.
  \item Id. at 392 (citing \textit{Monell}, 436 U.S. at 693–694).
  \item Id. at 392 (citing \textit{Rizzo}, 423 U.S. at 607-08).
  \item \textit{520 U.S. 397}.
  \item Id. at 405, 408-11, 312-14.
  \item Id. at 415.
\end{itemize}
exculpatory evidence because of its failure to train them on the constitutional requirements.\textsuperscript{98} In \textit{Connick v. Thompson}, the Court found that, despite at least four \textit{Brady} violations, the risk of additional violations was not so great as to require corrective action in the form of training on prosecutors’ disclosure obligations.\textsuperscript{99} In his concurrence, Scalia raised the same \textit{Monell}-respondeat superior liability and \textit{Rizzo}-federalism concerns over a lesser standard for holding municipalities liable for failure to train.\textsuperscript{100}

While case law continues to justify restrictions on individuals’ municipal liability claims for police abuses by invoking principles of federalism, legislation has existed for almost a quarter-century that affords the federal executive branch authority to pursue injunctive relief against the same police departments and local governments. Ironically, the latter authorities may raise greater concerns over federalism than individual municipal liability damages claims. More problematic, the statutory framework insufficiently addresses the compensatory, democratic, procedural justice, and civil recourse vacuum caused by the judicially imposed limitation on municipal liability claims.

\textbf{II. FEDERAL GOVERNMENT STRUCTURAL REFORM LITIGATION}

Increased concern over police brutality—in particular the beating of Rodney King and resulting social unrest—and appreciation that the courts effective foreclosed § 1983 litigation as police reform tool, impelled Congress to enact new legislation. In 1994 Congress passed the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, which, in part, authorizes the Attorney General to file a civil cause of action when local police agencies engage in a pattern or practice of unconstitutional misconduct.\textsuperscript{101} Under the act, the Justice Department may seek declaratory and equitable relief, \textit{but not damages}, to eliminate the misconduct.\textsuperscript{102} Private litigants, however, are afforded no such cause of action.\textsuperscript{103}

Section 14141 advocates credit the law for important police reforms.\textsuperscript{104} Section 14141 actions compel and foster institutional changes that local entities would not otherwise implement

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{98} 563 U.S. 51 (2011).
\textsuperscript{99} Id. at 62.
\textsuperscript{100} Id. at 74 (Scalia, J., concurring) (quoting City of Canton, 489 U.S. at 392 (citing Monell, 436 U.S. at 693–694; Rizzo, 423 U.S. at 607-08)).
\textsuperscript{102} Id.
\end{flushright}
for political and economic reasons. These changes usually include significant transparency and accountability mechanisms and lead to sustained corrections of police misconduct. Reforms under § 14141 also may reduce future litigations costs related to police abuses.

From a federalism perspective, however, section § 14141 and its attendant systematic injunctive relief may raise more concerns than individual damages lawsuits under § 1983. Structural reform litigation under § 14141 entails significant federal influence over local law enforcement policies and practices. Stephen Rushin and Griffin Edwards characterize such federal reforms as “the single most invasive form of external legal regulation imposed on American police departments.” Currently, “nearly one in five Americans is served by a law enforcement agency that has been subject to a Department of Justice (DOJ) investigation via § 14141.” As of 2016, the DOJ has conducted 61 formal investigations and entered into 31 settlement agreements with local entities, many of which were subjected to ongoing federal oversight.

The scope of § 14141 investigations and subsequent agreements and oversight is extensive. Most agreements, for example, require reforming a range of police practices, including use of force policies, reporting requirements, training, and internal investigations. Agreements under § 14141 also result in lengthy federal oversight of local police and high compliance standards, with monitoring spanning five to twelve years.

The costs of § 14141 reforms are also significant. And it is local governments that must pay for the changes, pushing the increased costs onto local taxpayers. Rushin estimates that Los Angeles, for example, paid out over $100 million during the time of its consent decree’s implementation and external monitoring.

Though virtually all structural reforms are undertaken through settlement agreements, § 14141 invariably entails federal coercion in the form of highly public investigations or threatened litigation. Section 14141 actions thus inevitably impose federal priorities on local governmental discretion. The DOJ’s impact may include requiring uniform changes that are not particularized to local needs, “forc[ing] municipalities to prioritize investments into police reform over other

---

105 Rushin, Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 104, at 1397-1404.
106 Id. at 1404. Some research suggests, however, that reforms may falter once oversight and monitoring end under a consent decree. Id. at 1410-11.
107 Id. at 1410-11.
109 Rushin, Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 104 at 1347-48, 1370.
110 Rushin & Edwards, supra note 108, at 730; Rushin, Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 104, at 1377.
111 Rushin, Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 104, at 1379. A few agreements also directly address bias and race in local policing. Id. at 1385-86. Rushin and Edwards contend that the wide scope and oversight arsenal under § 14141 make local police more likely to implement reforms than in response to individual cases often addressing a discrete procedural issue. Rushin & Edwards, supra note 108, at 750-51.
112 Rushin, Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 104, at 1392. Fig. 5, 1394.
113 Id. at 1393.
114 Id. at 1399-1400; Rushin & Edwards, supra note 108, at 728, 746 (noting “intense public scrutiny” caused by investigations).
115 Rushin, Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 104, at 1378 (“While each negotiated settlement should be specifically tailored to the unique needs of the individual municipality, the settlements have proven to be remarkably similar over time.”) municipal goals,” which may be at odds with the community’s preferences, and altering local government leadership.

In addition, some scholars contend that while the § 14141 reform process may address and improve system-wide police abuses, it also disrupts local communities and their relationships with police. Rushin and Edwards argue that “public § 14141 investigations are destabilizing incidents within targeted communities that expose the affected police departments to added public distrust and negative interactions.” They also contend that § 14141 reforms have led to crime increases as a result of less aggressive and efficient policing.

Moreover, the § 14141 “pattern or practice” liability standard appears far more capacious—at least in practice—than the § 1983 liability requirements. Indeed, the DOJ and some commentators believe § 14141 operates as a strict liability regime, requiring only the demonstration of a pattern or practice of unconstitutional conduct to justify declaratory or equitable relief from local governments and police departments. As a result state and local governments and police fall easily under federal court jurisdiction and oversight.

For example, the DOJ argued in 2016 structural reform litigation against two Colorado towns that the municipalities should be found liable for their police officers’ pattern or practice of unconstitutional violations “without any additional showing of municipal liability.” The DOJ contended that § 1983 liability standards should not apply to § 14141 actions because the latter (1) did not focus on individual conduct but on systemic violations, and (2) did not provide a damages remedy but only declaratory and equitable relief. Because virtually all local police entities have bowed to federal pressure and entered settlement agreements and consent decrees few courts have addressed the DOJ’s strict liability argument. In light of the comparatively low threshold for § 14141 actions, the federal government can easily entangle itself in local policing matters affecting wide swaths of law enforcement, leadership, and municipal finances for long periods of time.

Notwithstanding the powerful and ready tool that is structural reform litigation under § 14141, resources and politics limit its more widespread application. And these constraints may diminish federalism concerns. First, federal resources cannot be utilized to address all 18,000

---

116 Id. at 1397-1400.
117 Id. at 1400.
118 Rushin & Edwards, supra note 108, at 753.
120 See U.S. v. Colorado City, No. 3:12cv8123-HRH, 2016 WL 634118 (D. Ariz.); Harmon, Promoting Civil Rights, supra note 103, at 60.
121 Colorado City, No. 3:12cv8123-HRH, 2016 WL 634118 (D. Ariz.) (U.S. Gov’t Trial Motion, Memorandum and Affidavit).
122 Id.
124 John Jeffries, Jr. and George Rutherglen also contend that § 14141 does not raise the same issues of “interference with state and local government” as individual-plaintiff-initiated lawsuits because federal orders “obtained by federal local police agencies throughout the country. While § 14141 reform efforts often focus on some of the largest U.S. cities thereby impacting a substantial portion of the public, the vast majority of police departments escape federal scrutiny and management.

Second, federal political prerogatives dictate how frequently the DOJ employs its § 14141 authorities. The Clinton and Obama administration pursued far more § 14141 actions than did the Bush administration. And early in its term the Trump administration expressed disdain for § 14141 actions, criticizing the use of such authority as inimical to federalism principles. Section § 14141 police reform—and the attendant federal intrusion—will therefore fluctuate with political priorities.

Though political- and resource-driven concerns may limit federal interference in local policing, § 14141 may more squarely implicate the federalism concerns the Supreme Court raised in Monell and its progeny over § 1983 municipal liability claims. Indeed, the massive police department reforms undertaken through § 14141 appear to outpace the systemic changes addressed in Rizzo and United States v. Philadelphia.

While § 14141 has been an important tool in addressing police abuses, it is also an imperfect solution to the municipal liability lacuna. First, the differing political agendas and resource constraints that may render § 14141 less offensive to federalism concerns also limit its utility as tool for consistently combatting pervasive police misconduct.

Second, § 14141 fails to address procedural justice and local concerns that might be realized through a properly construed and applied § 1983. Section 14141’s usage brings both attention and some improvement to systemic problems in local policing, but the changes are often top-down solutions, lacking community engagement and input.

Several scholars have proposed amending § 14141 to authorize actions for equitable and injunctive relief by private attorneys-general to address the law’s lack of local representation and

---

125 Rushin & Edwards, supra note 108, at 750; Rushin, Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 106, at 1415-16.
126 Rushin & Edwards, supra note 108, at 750, 750 n. 144 (“99.7% of American law enforcement agencies have not been subject to DOJ intervention or investigation via § 14141”).
127 Rushin, Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 104, at 1371-72.
128 Sessions Memo, supra note 15.
129 See Patel, supra note 10, at 800 (2016) (describing “ways in which communities have felt marginalized in the DOJ's efforts to reform police departments”); id. at 799 (observing that “community engagement, with little exception, has largely fallen short of advocates' and harmed communities' expectations for reform”); Myriam E. Gilles, In Defense of Making Government Pay: The Deterrent Effect of Constitutional Tort Remedies, 35 Ga. L. Rev. 845, 879 (2001) (“A regime that forces community leaders—particularly in minority communities—to come hat in hand to federal officials seeking protection of their civil rights is at cross purposes with a zeitgeist that encourages community empowerment and everywhere looks to roll back reliance upon government.”) [hereinafter Gilles, In Defense of Making Government Pay]; Gilles, Reinventing Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 27, at 1387 (noting that the primacy of § 14141 in structural reform of police practices ignores “the eyes, experiences, motivation, and resources of millions of Americans who bear witness to institutionalized wrongdoing and are willing to endure the expense of rooting it out.”).
agency. Though laudable, these statutory reforms might subject individual-initiated suits to DOJ approval and impede federal officials own reform efforts.

Finally, even if viewed as an adjunct to § 1983, § 14141 aids only § 1983’s deterrence goal but provides no compensation for victims. As a result, a strange system of bifurcated municipal liability emerges when it comes to police misconduct—one that permits selective and limited government-initiated systemic, injunctive relief claims to flow readily but practically bans individual victims’ discrete damages claims. The next part accordingly proposes that damages claims against municipal entities should be held to a lesser standard of proof.

III. A DISTINCT AND LENIENT MUNICIPAL LIABILITY DAMAGES STANDARD

Premised on the revisionist account that what initially animated the Court’s stringent causation standards for municipal liability was concern over intrusive injunctive relief, I argue here that relief under § 1983 should be bifurcated; specifically, municipal liability claims for damages relief merit a diminished standard of proof. Even if one does not accept the revisionist account of Monell, the functional argument is similar: the discrete and retrospective nature of damages does not raise the same federalism concerns as equitable relief’s prospective and often invasive reforms. Moreover, historical skepticism of injunctive relief—indeed of municipal liability—argues for distinct standards. Finally, the lesser standard should facilitate compensation to victims, buttress the public’s faith in the legal system, ensure some vindication of constitutional rights, and properly affix responsibility for police misconduct.

A. The Historical and Practical Relationship Between Damages and Injunctive and Equitable Relief

Historically, injunctions were viewed as extraordinary relief, to be used “sparingly” even in disputes between private parties. Unless a remedy at law proved inadequate, an equitable remedy was not available. These general principles of equitable restraint apply with even greater force where federal courts are asked to enjoin state or local government actions. Several scholars contend that, given the “historical relationship” between law and equity, “damages should be at least as available as injunctions, if not more.”

---

130 Gilles, Reinventing Structural Reform Litigation, supra note 27, at 1417-18; Schwartz, Who Can Police the Police?, supra note 14, at 482 (endorsing Gilles’s proposal and adding that she “would allow prevailing plaintiffs bringing pattern and practice claims to recover attorneys’ fees under section 1988 as an additional incentive.”).
131 Rachel Harmon questions whether private suits would aid § 1414 1 reforms, arguing that they may be ineffective, if litigated alone, and also may interfere with federal investigations and lawsuits. Harmon, Promoting Civil Rights, supra note 10, at 57-62.
133 Irwin v. Dixon, 9 How. 10, 33, 13 L.Ed. 25 (1850); Rizzo, 423 U.S. at 378.
134 Rizzo, 423 U.S. at 379-80.
135 See John Preis, In Defense of Implied Injunctive Relief in Constitutional Cases, 22 WM. & MARY BILL RTS. J. 1, 3 (2013) (addressing implied constitutional actions); id. (“To arrange the doctrine differently ‘gets the traditional interplay between law and equity exactly backwards.’ If the Court is to respect history, therefore, it should dramatically
Law has long recognized that the mode of redress affects how to assess responsibility or blameworthiness. The distinct civil and criminal regimes, for example, with their differing methods of accountability, e.g., damages v. imprisonment, influence the burdens of proof, e.g., preponderance of the evidence v. beyond a reasonable doubt. The import of a criminal conviction—deprivation of liberty, moral opprobrium, stigma—justifies requiring greater proof of misconduct than do the trappings of civil penalties such as fines. Even in a unitary regime like § 1983, then, different remedies should reasonably dictate the standards by which courts review government actor misconduct.

By their very nature damages will not usually entail judicial interference in government action in the same disruptive manner as equitable and injunctive relief. Damages are generally retrospective, discrete, measurable, and predictable. Equitable and injunctive remedies are frequently prospective, indefinite, indeterminate, and often wide-ranging. Contrary to injunctive relief, courts also may fashion damages remedies at some remove from emergent events, usually after obtaining significant information. In a determining a damages remedy, courts may therefore “exercise such judicial virtues as calm reflection and dispassionate application of the law to the facts.” The current state of police misconduct litigation under § 1983 and § 14141, however, inverts the law and equity relationship, paying little heed to its historical antecedents and practical application.

B. The Importance of Municipal Damages for Constitutional Torts

Enabling local government and police department liability for damages for constitutional violations is critical to ensuring police accountability. A viable monetary remedy against municipalities for police brutality affords a modicum of compensation to victims, restores public trust in the law, develops legal rights, and assigns moral blame.

1. Compensation and Motivation

It is entirely possible that not enough people sue police departments. According to Bureau of Justice Statistics from 2002, only 1.3 percent of people who believe the police used improper increase the availability of implied constitutional damages.” (quoting Gene R. Nichol, Bivens, Chilicky, and Constitutional Damages Claims, 75 VA. L. REV. 1117, 1135 (1989)). John Preis acknowledges that the Court could—instead of extending damages availability—“withdraw the easy availability of injunctive actions, thus making them harder to obtain than damages actions.” Id. at 4. It could be argued that in Lyons the Court returned to a more traditional approach to addressing claims of relief, treating prospective remedies more skeptically than damages, albeit through the standing doctrine, rather than under § 1983 causation standards. But this argument ignores the inappposite equitable relief-influenced federalism concerns that suffuse the Monell causation requirement to begin with, resulting in an inappropriate high-causation burden as the floor. See supra Part I.D., F. 136

Abbasi, 137 S.Ct. at 1884 (Breyer, J., dissenting). Addressing the availability of a Bivens-damages remedy for conditions of confinement after the September 11 terrorist attacks Justice Breyer notes that courts are more likely to defer to government action during emergencies, making a damages remedy all the more vital in securing some accountability for government excesses. 137

Prior to Monroe, “[h]owever, many suits that might have been brought under § 1983 as interpreted by Monroe were treated instead as actions for a remedy (usually an injunction) implied directly under the Constitution.” Richard H. Fallon, Jr. et al., Hart & Wechsler’s the Federal Courts and the Federal System 1081 (5th ed. 2003). 138 force against them ever filed a lawsuit. At the most basic level, a broadened municipal liability damages remedy should result in more lawsuits and more money in more victims’ pockets. The potentially lacking deterrent effect should not necessarily detract from a diminished liability standard’s legitimacy when it compensates a victim of a constitutional violation.

While plaintiffs could have any number of reasons for suing a municipality, money may motivate them to endure the temporal, financial, and psychological costs of litigation. Financial compensation is a vital element of a tort system, whether one takes a damages-as-indemnification or a damages-as-redress approach. And in many instances, other constitutional rights remedies, be they protective in the form of suppression, or prospective, styled as an injunction, may not be available. Lifting the constraints on municipal liability should prod more people to seek retrospective money damages for constitutional violations.

2. Trust and Procedural Justice

Police abuse and lack of accountability—civil and criminal—can easily erode people’s respect for, and allegiance to, legal institutions. Enabling more individual lawsuits seeking damages from local governments to proceed to trial may combat these ill effects, instilling greater public trust in the legal system. An easier municipal damages lawsuit process also achieves an important degree of public community engagement and empowerment.

Tom Tyler’s procedural justice studies find that people’s perceptions of the fairness of judicial proceedings significantly influence their acceptance of decisions and respect for the legal system. Moreover, the influence of fair procedures does not vary based on people’s racial, ethnic and socio-economic background.

---

140 Undoubtedly other factors explain people’s reluctance to sue over police excessive force. Daniel Meltzer suggests that many victims’ interactions with the police were as “suspects or defendants” and that they may not sue due to “ignorance of their rights, poverty, fear of police reprisals, or the burdens of incarceration.” Daniel J. Meltzer, Deterring Constitutional Violations by Law Enforcement Officials: Plaintiffs and Defendants as Private Attorneys General, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 247, 284 (1988). Other injuries may not merit litigation because they are “small, widely dispersed, and intangible.” Id.

141 See Bivens, 403 U.S. at 408 (Harlan, J., concurring) (“Damages as a traditional form of compensation for invasion of a legally protected interest may be entirely appropriate even if no substantial deterrent effects on future official lawlessness might be thought to result.”).

142 Schwartz, Who Can Police the Police?, supra note 14, at 451 (observing that plaintiff’s motivations in a damages lawsuit may involve several objectives: “to punish individual defendants, to reform law enforcement, to have their day in court, or to get paid”).

143 Wells, supra note 5, at 1036.

144 Id. at 1051. See also Bivens, 403 U.S. at 410 (1971) (Harlan, J., concurring) (“For people in Bivens’ shoes, it is damages or nothing.”).

147 Id. at 28.
Heightened municipal liability standards fail to meet a core procedural justice principle: voice. “Having an opportunity to voice their perspective has a positive effect upon people’s experience with the legal system irrespective of their outcome, as long as they feel that the authority sincerely considered their arguments before making their decision.”\(^{148}\) Simply put, a more generous standard ensures that the victim “feels heard.”\(^{149}\)

Permitting more victims to participate in damages actions against their respective governments and police departments—even if they ultimately lose—improves “perceptions of the legitimacy of the system and about the [adjudication] process.”\(^{150}\) Allowing more cases to extend beyond motions to dismiss and for summary judgment also enables victims to “publicly present their stories and have them ‘authenticated,’ create a public record of the events, and have their cases decided by a jury.”\(^{151}\) These lawsuits also may become civic opportunities for public engagement and education on government misconduct and reform regardless of the lawsuit’s outcome. They also may provide autonomy and agency to some of a community’s often-most-marginalized population.\(^{152}\)

3. Vindicating Constitutional Rights

Increasing damages liability exposure for municipalities may be justified under civil recourse theory. As opposed to the traditional tort rationale, which emphasizes indemnification, “the civil recourse principle holds that the point of tort law should be to empower the plaintiff to exact redress for wrongs.”\(^{153}\) Compensation is certainly part of the tort action’s objective. But along with a victim’s losses, a fact-finder should consider “the character of the defendant’s conduct, . . . and the power dynamic between the parties.”\(^{154}\)

Michael Wells argues that the constitutional torts context especially merits application of civil recourse principles.\(^{155}\) Obtaining a damages remedy—or at least a hearing in court—against a governmental entity for constitutional violations is more compelling than in the private tort context “because the rights asserted are more vital and the defendants from whom redress is sought are more powerful and more dangerous.”\(^{156}\) Indeed the very purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment and Bill of Rights is to protect the people from government abuse.\(^{157}\)

\(^{148}\) Id. at 30.

\(^{152}\) See Gilles, In Defense of Making Government Pay, supra note 129, at 879 (criticizing dependence on federal officials under § 14141 as “at cross purposes with a zeitgeist that encourages community empowerment”).

\(^{153}\) Wells, supra note 5, at 1009. Michael Wells traces the Court’s animosity to government constitutional tort liability to a tort theory focused on “indemnification” and “allocation of losses.” Id. at 1005-07 (discussing Carey v. Piphus, 435 U.S. 247, 258-59 (1978); Memphis Community School District v. Stachura, 477 U.S. 299, 308 (1986)).

\(^{155}\) Wells, supra note 5, at 1012-13

\(^{156}\) Id. at 1012.

\(^{157}\) Id.
Civil recourse should permit more constitutional tort lawsuits to get through the courthouse doors without bankrupting local governments. The focus on vindicating constitutional rights makes it harder “to justify rules that foreclose plaintiffs from obtaining” damages at all.\textsuperscript{158} Civil recourse theory therefore dictates a departure from the Monell-driven heightened municipal liability standards for damages.\textsuperscript{159} But because the primary objective of civil recourse is to redress constitutional wrongs, a damages award need not always provide full compensation for actual losses.\textsuperscript{160} Civil recourse thus affords factfinders a good deal of flexibility as they consider the varying equities and policy considerations often attendant to constitutional litigation in reaching damages calculations.\textsuperscript{161} Legislators might similarly consider incorporating limits on damages in connection with reduced liability standards.\textsuperscript{162}

Other scholars have advocated making it easier to obtain relief for certain constitutional torts through presumed or nominal damages. Jean C. Love contends that presumed damages are the only means for compensating “the infringement of constitutionally protected intangible interests.”\textsuperscript{163} She proposes that victims of, for example, procedural due process violations, should not have to prove actual damages, as is the case with dignitary torts such as defamation.\textsuperscript{164} Under such a legislatively crafted regime, victims would be able to recover a liquidated sum, guaranteeing a minimum amount, or a range, from which the court could determine the appropriate award.\textsuperscript{165} Love also acknowledges that a more lenient standard of proof of damages would also at least facilitate better compensation of constitutional torts victims.\textsuperscript{166}

Advocates of more readily awarding nominal damages argue that such relief will facilitate judicial vindication of constitutional rights because courts will not be deterred by concern over the remedy’s financial impact.\textsuperscript{167} As several critics have noted, however, the lack of sufficient monetary relief may fail to motivate plaintiffs to sue and therefore prevent sufficient development and protection of constitutional rights.\textsuperscript{168}

\begin{footnotesize}
\textsuperscript{158} Id. at 1008.
\textsuperscript{159} Id. at 1052-53.
\textsuperscript{160} Id. at 1036.
\textsuperscript{161} Id. at 1034. \textit{See} id. at 1054 (“[C]ivil recourse consistently and broadly favors at least some vindication of constitutional rights and some redress of constitutional wrongs.”).
\textsuperscript{162} \textit{See infra} Part IV.B.2.
\textsuperscript{164} Id. at 1261
\textsuperscript{165} Id. at 1284
\textsuperscript{166} Id. at 1282.
\textsuperscript{167} \textit{See e.g.}, James E. Pfander, \textit{Resolving the Qualified Immunity Dilemma: Constitutional Tort Claims for Nominal Damages}, 111 COLUM. L. REV. 1601, 1607-08 (2011) (proposing that suits for nominal damages should entitle plaintiffs to “immunity-free determination of their constitutional claims”)[hereinafter Pfander, \textit{Resolving the Qualified Immunity Dilemma}]; Smith, \textit{supra} note 1, at 483-84 (addressing nominal damages approach for local governments).
\textsuperscript{168} Love, \textit{supra} note 163, at 1272. Love contends that nominal damages do not serve the purposes of compensation, deterrence, and vindication because the one-dollar award makes it unlikely that plaintiffs will “initiate constitutional tort litigation to recover nominal damages alone.” Id. In fact, Love argues, nominal damages’ small amount may “more often have the symbolic effect of diminishing the legitimacy of the plaintiff’s complaint.” Id. at 1281. Pfander acknowledges the concerns over motivation and even suggests that nominal damages could foster greater judicial \end{footnotesize}
4. Affixing Responsibility

Less restrictive municipal liability standards for damages also may better approximate a local government’s actual responsibility for constitutional violations. Myriam Gilles praises municipal liability principally for its “fault-fixing function.”

Gilles criticizes government indemnification of individual officers for their constitutional violations because it fails to apportion blame or deter and reform police misconduct. First, indemnification is generally a contractually-bargained benefit, predating a constitution violation. Thus payouts are unlikely to compel local governments to seriously assess department culpability and government leaders will regard them as the “costs of doing business.” Second, indemnification allows local governments to “deflect attention from systemic and institutional factors contributing to recurring constitutional deprivations” by focusing on only the “bad cops.”

Municipal liability, on the other hand, Gilles contends, “makes it more difficult to take refuge in the ‘bad apple theory’ and more likely that the municipality will take steps to remedy the broader problem.” Apart from economic motivations, municipal liability is more likely to publicly shame local government as well as expose information through discovery that may be beyond the scope of individual officer lawsuits. Extolling municipal liability’s “predictable and salutary effects” on police misconduct, Gilles proposes broadening liability to encompass “customs” that local police ignore and tacitly encourage.

Peter Schuck also would reduce standards for municipal liability to better align with private tort conceptions of responsibility and more accurately reflect how local government causes unlawful behavior. First, Schuck argues, the “local government’s nexus to the violation” should often “satisfy both the cause-in-fact and proximate cause criteria, as those concepts are understood in private tort law.” Putting aside vicarious liability, the government’s relationship to the government worker who commits the violation amounts to “plac[ing] her in a position in which hostility toward compensatory relief and reduce the number of claims against higher officials. Pfander, Resolving the Qualified Immunity Dilemma, supra note 167, at 1634-36.

\hspace{1cm}

169 Gilles, In Defense of Making Government Pay, supra note 129, at 863. See also Amato v. City of Saratoga Springs, 170 F.3d 311, 317-18 (2d Cir. 1999) (“The ability to promote an individual official’s “scrupulous observance” of the Constitution is important. Perhaps even more important to society, however, is the ability to hold a municipality accountable where official policy or custom has resulted in the deprivation of constitutional rights.”).

171 Id.

172 Id.

175 Id. at 859-60.

176 Id. at 867.

177 Id. at 867-68; Gilles, Breaking the Code of Silence, supra note 173. Gilles also would subject local governments to punitive damages for “systemic and widespread” constitutional violations. Gilles, In Defense of Making Government Pay, supra note 129, at 873.

178 Schuck, supra note 64, at 1764-65 (noting that “some causal nexus between agency and injury almost invariably exists as a factual matter”).

179 Id. at 1779.
the violation is possible, perhaps (on some facts) even probable.”

Second, the local government operates a monopoly over services like policing and thus also undertakes “special moral obligations to perform them in socially beneficial ways.”

Finally, “risk-creating” endeavors such as policing also merit liability just as would a similarly hazardous private enterprises.

The reduced damage standards for municipalities thus cohere with a more realistic, but moral, comprehension of local government responsibility for police abuse.

A more permissive municipal damages liability standard also should address the interdependent weaknesses of qualified immunity.

Victims of police officer abuse may be left with no one to hold accountable because of both immunity doctrines’ government-favoring biases. Yet concerns over unfairly penalizing officers when a constitutional right’s clarity is lacking have some force. The doctrine goes too far, however, when officers may deny the clarity of a prohibition despite their own department’s policy guidance banning the misconduct at issue.

As I have argued elsewhere, qualified immunity doctrine should be changed to encompass local department policies as evidence of a “clearly established right.”

As a necessary complement to that move, I propose in Part IV that municipalities should be subject to damages liability where they lack policies that, according to national consensus, are necessary to prevent constitutional violations, and a person is therefore injured. These fixes should better approximate actual individual officer and officer liability. The delineation of responsibility also might encourage departments to better develop and adopt appropriate police policies.

C. Responses to a Bifurcated Relief-based Regime.

The following discussion addresses possible objections to bifurcating relief, most of which are grounded in the Court’s § 1983 and immunity jurisprudence. The section also focuses on potential legislative history arguments against a bifurcated model.

1. Undifferentiated Relief-based Approach to § 1983

The Supreme Court has not embraced a bifurcated relief-based approach to § 1983 claims. The Court has generally treated claims against municipalities the same regardless of whether the relief sought is monetary or equitable. Certainly the language of § 1983 does not distinguish between the modes of relief: “Every person . . . shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress.”

---

180 Id. The government has “authorized (perhaps mandated), supervised, trained, equipped, and paid the individual who causes injury.” Id. Schuck also argues that, rather than causation, municipal liability may be viewed as a duty to control—a concept that has generally expanded in private law. Id. at 1764-72.

181 Id. at 1780.

182 Id.

183 See Smith, supra note 1, at 478 ("[B]ecause immunities for government agents and immunities for local entities often work in tandem to block constitutional accountability, the optimal approach to adjudicating constitutional torts should take this synergy into account.").

184 See Cover, supra note 3, at 1824-31.

185 Id.

186 See infra Part IV.A.

Two years after Monroe, in City of Kenosha, Wisconsin v. Bruno, the Court rejected applying differing liability standards based on the relief requested. Justice Rehnquist explained, “We find nothing in the legislative history discussed in Monroe, or in the language actually used by Congress, to suggest that the generic word ‘person’ in § 1983 was intended to have a bifurcated application to municipal corporations depending on the nature of the relief sought against them.”188

Justice Douglas, the author of Monroe, contended in his partial dissent that that opinion had only foreclosed monetary relief against local government, not equitable relief.189 Douglas’s legislative historical account of § 1983—revised and overruled by Monell—attributed Congress’ rejection of the Sherman Amendment to the destructive and paralyzing effect of damages on municipalities.190 But Monell, which addressed what, in practice, were monetary claims, overruled Monroe’s bar on municipal liability, yet clarified that it did not disturb the Monroe-progeny’s holding that § 1983 applied equally to both equitable and monetary claims of relief.191

Finally, in 2010, the Court unanimously held in Los Angeles Cty., Cal. v. Humphries that Monell’s “causation requirement” applies, regardless of whether the plaintiffs seek damages or equitable relief.192 The Court rejected the argument that claims for injunctive relief should not be subject to the “policy or custom” requirement of claims for damages. As the Court explained, “whether an action or omission is a municipality’s ‘own’ has to do with the nature of the action or omission, not with the nature of the relief that is later sought in court.”193 The Court stressed that Monell’s causation requirement and rejection of respondeat superior were not so much motivated by economic concerns but by limiting municipal liability to its “own wrongful conduct.”194

As I argued earlier, I am not convinced that Monell’s municipal liability standards can be untethered from the Court’s worries over protracted federal judicial involvement in institutional reform litigation. Moreover, the § 1983 liability regime is so messy as to confound such purported analytical consistency.195

2. Ex parte Young

A bifurcated approach that is more lenient regarding damages claims also runs counter to the underlying logic of the arrangement vis-à-vis state liability. The state constitutional torts liability regime is illogically distinct from the approach to local government. Under the Eleventh

---

188 412 U.S. at 513.
189 See id. at 516 (Douglas, J., dissenting in part) (“I have expressed my doubts in Moor v. County of Alameda, 411 U.S. 693, 722 (dissenting opinion) that our decision in Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167, bars equitable relief against a municipality.”) (citations omitted).
190 Id. at 519-20 (“To the extent that the Sherman Amendment was directed only at liability for damages and the devastating effect those damages might have on municipalities, it seems that the defeat of the amendment does not affect the existence vel non of an equitable action.”).
191 436 U.S. at 701 n. 66.
192 562 U.S. 29, 37 (2010) (“Monell’s logic also argues against any such relief-based bifurcation.”).
193 Id. at 37.
194 Id. at 38.
195 Jeffries, Jr., Liability Rules, supra note 86, at 238 (observing that § 1983 doctrine “imposes diametrically opposite liability rules on governmental defendants that are functionally indistinguishable”).
Amendment states enjoy sovereign immunity from private litigants’ damages claims.\footnote{Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1 (1890); Will v. Mich. Dep’t of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 71 (1989).} In \textit{Ex parte Young}, however, the Court held that private litigants may seek to enjoin state officials from undertaking unconstitutional actions.\footnote{209 U.S. 123 (1908). See also Jeffries, Jr. & Ruther glen, supra note 124, at 1395-96 (describing Ex parte Young as “[t]he case that shunted aside the traditional presumption against equitable relief,” and that its impact “was magnified by contemporaneous developments allowing federal courts to issue injunctions when state courts could not do so.”) id. at 1396-98 (noting resulting efforts by Congress, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 2283, and the Court, e.g., City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, to limit federal court injunctions).} But the relief is limited in that any funds required to provide the “equitable restitution” may not come from the state treasury.\footnote{Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 668 (1974). But see id. at 667 (acknowledging that differences between permissible and impermissible relief are difficult to discern and that prospective relief permitted under \textit{Ex parte Young} may affect state revenues).}

The state liability line of cases thus offers a mirror-image of the relief-based bifurcation regime that I propose—precluding damages liability entirely, while permitting, functionally speaking, injunctive relief against the state. Because the Eleventh Amendment does not immunize local governments from their constitutional torts, it is difficult to justify a more lenient \textit{equitable} relief standard because an adequate alternative remedy may (\textit{should}) be available, \textit{i.e.}, damages. Damages relief may be made more feasible by not subjecting monetary claims to the same standards that have historically been imposed where equitable relief is sought, the very same high standards raised in \textit{Rizzo} that permeate the reasoning of \textit{Monell} and its progeny.

3. Legislative history

It may be argued that a bifurcated regime favoring damages claims over those seeking equitable remedies runs counter to the legislative intentions that led to the 1871 Act. One of the primary concerns that motivated the earlier version of § 1983 was inaction on the part of southern law enforcement officials in response to private acts of violence against African Americans. Yet, as David Jacks Achtenberg persuasively argues, the 42nd Congress was not averse to expansive damages relief against local governments, including through vicarious liability and respondeat superior.\footnote{Achtenberg, \textit{Taking History Seriously}, supra note 84, at 2197-97, 2203-04; id. at 2203 (arguing that rejection of Sherman Act reflected only congressional opposition to “making cities liable for damages resulting, not from the conduct of their employees, but rather from racially motivated mob violence occurring within the cities’ boundaries”).} To be sure, injunctive relief might appear the more effective and responsive remedy in compelling local law enforcement to protect victims of racist violence. But notwithstanding Justice Douglas’s account in \textit{Kenosha}, nothing in the Act’s legislative history precludes bifurcating liability based on relief, nor should it necessarily favor equitable relief over damages relief standards.

Finally, as Michael Gerhardt argues, the Court has crafted a § 1983 jurisprudence that more closely resembles federal common law, negating the need to mine legislative history consistent with a holding.\footnote{Michael J. Gerhardt, \textit{The Monell Legacy: Balancing Federalism Concerns and Municipal Accountability Under Section 1983}, 62 S. Cal. L. Rev. 539, 557-58 (1989). See also Achtenberg, \textit{Taking History Seriously}, supra note 84, at 2197-97 (concluding that fidelity to “the common law decision-making process” requires the Court to overrule \textit{Monell}).} Moreover, Michael Wells demonstrates that the Court’s § 1983 jurisprudence—including on municipal liability—frequently “rel[jes] on policy considerations.”201 The Court’s emphasis on federalism concerns, therefore, justifies a bifurcated regime that affords damages remedies on a lesser showing of liability than is required for equitable relief, the latter being the greater accelerant of overstepping federal courts in areas of local concern.

D. Calcified Municipal Liability

Forty years of Monell have calcified the opinion into a hardened precedent that the Court is unlikely to budge by loosening municipal liability standards or bifurcating relief.202 The Court has proved itself reliably opposed to expanding constitutional tort liability, shutting the door repeatedly on loosening the bounds of qualified immunity or expanding federal causes of action.203 Taken together, these considerations, along with principles of stare decisis, separation of powers, and, of course, federalism, render it near-delusory to expect the Court to revisit its municipal liability jurisprudence. Accordingly, any bifurcated municipal liability regime will need to usher from Congress.204

E. Chief Justice Burger’s Progressive, Legislative Proposal

While legislation may sometimes emerge from the scrapheap of judicial dicta, Chief Justice Warren Burger would appear an unlikely source for a statute affording victims of police brutality a realistically obtainable damage remedy against municipalities. But that is largely the framework he sketched out in his dissenting opinion in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Fed. Bureau of Narcotics, where he objected to the Court’s crafting of a damages remedy for a federal agent’s Fourth Amendment violation that Congress had not authorized.205 Though he proposed only a federal remedial scheme, Burger hoped that states would adopt similar statutes, all of which “would move our system toward more responsible law enforcement.”206 None of this rankled Burger’s staunch federalist orientation.207

201 Wells, supra note 5, at 1049 (citing Owen, 445 U.S. at 638-50; Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 813-14 (1982)).
202 See Pfänd, Resolving the Qualified Immunity Dilemma, supra note 167, at 1631 (“[T]he Court will hesitate to embrace any development aimed at facilitating constitutional tort litigation.”).
203 Abbasi, 137 S.Ct. 1843.
204 See Pfänd, Resolving the Qualified Immunity Dilemma, supra note 167, at 1629 n. 146 (“Immunity doctrine has been primarily the subject of judicial development, but its contours do not appear to be constitutionally compelled. Congress would thus appear to have substantial power to legislate on the question of official immunity and it has occasionally done so.”) If not “near-delusional,” it may strike some readers as farcical to expect anytime soon that Congress will legislate at all, let alone in the realm of police accountability. The 115th Congress appears on pace, or maybe even a bit behind, the past few Congress’ record-breaking low number of enacted laws. See Statistics and Historical Comparison: Bills by Final Status, GOVTRACK, https://www.govtrack.us/congress/bills/statistics (accessed Aug. 9, 2017); Norm Ornstein, Is this the Worst Congress Ever?, THE ATLANTIC, May 17, 2016, https://www.theatlantic.com/politics/archive/2016/05/is-this-the-worst-congress-ever/483075/ (accessed Aug. 9, 2017); Jonathan Topaz, Worst Congress Ever: By the Numbers, POLITICO, Dec. 17, 2014, http://www.politico.com/story/2014/12/congress-numbers-113658 (accessed Aug. 9, 2017).
205 403 U.S. at 422–24 (Burger, C.J., dissenting).
206 Id. at 424.
Writing during the interim between Monroe and Monell, Burger called on Congress to enact a “remedy against the government itself to afford compensation and restitution” to police misconduct victims.\(^2\) Observing that lawsuits against individual officers had not proven effective at stemming police misconduct, Burger’s statute waives sovereign immunity, adheres to respondeat superior principles, applies to both police intentional and negligent wrongdoing, encompasses error and intentional wrongdoing by officers, and vests jurisdiction in a specialized tribunal.\(^3\)

To be sure, Burger felt any such remedy was outside the Court’s creative power, as reflected in Bivens\(^4\) and later in his joining the dissent in Monell. Yet he envisioned that the judiciary would have “the ultimate responsibility for determining and articulating standards” in his remedial scheme.\(^5\)

The congressional response to Burger’s proposal and Bivens was mixed. Congress amended the Federal Tort Claims Act to substitute the United States as “generally liable on a simple respondeat superior theory for the common law torts of its employees.”\(^6\) But Congress declined to enact possible United States liability for constitutional violations.\(^7\) Today, the need for congressionally authorized local police accountability through expanded compensation is even more pronounced.

IV. A NEW MUNICIPAL LIABILITY DAMAGES STANDARD

This Part sketches out the details of a new statutory provision for purposes of obtaining damages relief against local governments and entities. The proposal builds on § 14141, § 1983 case law, and the interaction between qualified immunity and municipal liability doctrines. The proposed statutory framework would by and large remove the need for litigants to meet the strict definitions of “policy” and “policymaker” or demonstrate “deliberate indifference” or “moving force” causation in failure to train, prevent, and discipline claims.

---

\(^2\) 403 U.S. at 422 (Burger, C.J., dissenting). Burger’s proposal also would have required that the misconduct at issue be included within the “officer’s personnel file so that the need for additional training or disciplinary action could be identified or his future usefulness as a public official evaluated.” Id. at 423.

\(^3\) Id. at 421-24.

\(^4\) Id. at 421 (“Legislation is the business of the Congress, and it has the facilities and competence for that task—as we do not.”).

\(^5\) Id. at 423. Burger also preferred the damages remedy to the suppression doctrine as a limitation on police misconduct, noting the potential “meaningful redress” for victims rather than letting criminals go free. Id. at 424. While sympathetic to the innocent victim, his proposal would have undone criminal defendants’ protections established pursuant to the exclusionary rule. Burger’s proposal would have required that no evidence be excluded from a criminal proceeding on the basis of a Fourth Amendment violation. Id. at 423.

\(^7\) James E. Pfander & David Baltmanidis, Rethinking Bivens: Legitimacy and Constitutional Adjudication, 98 GEO. L. J. 117, 123 (2009).
A. The Statutory Framework

Under the proposed framework, municipal liability meriting damages relief for police misconduct may be demonstrated in two different ways. In addition, the proposal expands individual officer liability in certain circumstances.

(1) Pattern or Practice Liability. A person may in a civil action obtain appropriate damages relief from the relevant local government authority when:
   (a) the person has been subjected to a constitutional harm (deprivation of rights, privileges, or immunities secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States) by the local government’s law enforcement officers; and
   (b) the constitutional harm is part of a pattern or practice of conduct by the local government’s law enforcement officers.

(2) Lack of Policy Liability. A person may in a civil action obtain appropriate damages relief from the relevant local government authority when:
   (a) the person has been subjected to a constitutional harm;
   (b) the local government authority has a duty to prevent the harm, as evidenced through a generally (national) accepted norm, policy, or custom aimed at preventing the harm;
   (c) the local government authority lacks a policy preventing the harm; and
   (d) the harm is a foreseeable consequence of the lack of policy.

   (e) The local government authority may not be held liable for damages if it shows that the lack of policy did not cause the constitutional harm.

(3) Notice of Constitutional Right. The existence of a local government authority policy aimed at preventing a constitutional harm provides notice to any of the local government’s law enforcement officers of the prohibition and “clearly establishes” a constitutional right against such harms for purposes of § 1983 civil actions.

1. Pattern or Practice Liability

   Section 1 of the legislative proposal largely tracks the language and reasoning of § 14141. A local government should be held responsible for a specific constitutional harm that an individual officer perpetrates when the same types of constitutional harms have been perpetrated in the past by the local government’s officers. The local government’s failure to prevent repeated harms amounts to—at the minimum—acquiescence or tacit approval—and should therefore constitute a “policy or custom” for purposes of securing local government liability and a damages remedy. The lack of any specific order or directive by a policymaker is immaterial. Conceiving of a pattern or practice, i.e., what actually happens, as a de facto “policy” accords with Peter Schuck’s observation that “low-level, bottom-up processes” and “street-level bureaucrats” frequently determine policy.\(^{214}\)

---

Critical questions may arise concerning this avenue for municipal damages relief. First, when does a harm rise to the frequency of a pattern or practice? Addressing § 1983 actions, the Supreme Court has held that “[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is ‘ordinarily necessary’ to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train.”\(^{215}\) In the § 14141 context, the DOJ contends that a pattern or practice requires “repeated and not isolated instances” of constitutional violations.\(^{216}\) But, the DOJ qualifies, a court need not find a “specific number of incidents” or be shown “statistical evidence” to find a pattern or practice.\(^{217}\) Relying on International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States, concerning Title VII employment discrimination government, the DOJ explains that the phrase “‘was not intended as a term of art,’ but should be interpreted according to its usual meaning ‘consistent with the understanding of the identical words’ used in other federal civil rights statutes.”\(^{218}\)

This broad definition in the § 14141 context has been subject to little judicial review,\(^{219}\) but a capacious basis for municipal damages liability may elicit resistance. Courts have struggled in the § 1983 arena over what number of past violations would put local government officials on notice such that municipal liability should attach for the entity’s inaction.\(^{220}\) In Connick v. Thompson, four members of the Court would have held that four instances of Brady violations in the Orleans Parish District Attorney’s Office resulting in overturned convictions amount to a pattern and constitutes notice for purposes of assessing foreseeability, deliberate indifference, and failure to train.\(^{221}\) But the majority did not address the requisite number of violations for a pattern, treating the claim as one based on a single incident.\(^{222}\) The ultimate question of how many instances amounts to a pattern or practice may necessarily be left for courts to determine.

Equally challenging under the present proposal is defining the scope of constitutional harms within a pattern or practice. The Justices disagreed in Connick over what degree of similarity is required between the prior misconduct and the underlying constitutional harm. The majority discounted the pattern of preceding Brady violations because they did not involve—as was at issue in the case—“failure to disclose blood evidence, a crime lab report, or physical or scientific evidence of any kind.”\(^{223}\) In contrast, the dissenter took a broader view of a pattern of unconstitutional conduct, contending that the fact of the prior Brady violations should have alerted the prosecutor’s office to the foreseeability of the office’s unlawful secret retention of crime lab

\(^{215}\) Connick, 563 U.S. at 62 (quoting Board of Comm’rs of Bryan Cty., 520 U.S. at 409).

\(^{217}\) DOJ REPORT, supra note 216, at 12 (citing Catlett v. Mo. Highway & Transp. Comm’n, 828 F.2d 1260, 1265 (8th Cir. 1987) (Title VII); United States v. W. Peachtree Tenth Corp., 437 F.2d 221, 227 (5th Cir. 1971)

\(^{218}\) Id. (quoting Int’l Bd. of Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 336 n. 16).

\(^{219}\) See supra Part II, (discussing cases addressing pattern or practice).

\(^{220}\) WASSERMAN, supra note 88, at 132-33.

\(^{221}\) 563 U.S. at 104 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting).

\(^{222}\) Id. at 62.

\(^{223}\) Id. at 62-63.
Thus, here too, courts will need to determine the requisite degree of similarity between prior instances of unconstitutional violation and the specific harm a plaintiff alleges. Though given the proposed statute’s expanded remedial intentions, courts should incline toward finding a similar relationship between constitutional harms and prior violations, departing from the currently limiting municipal liability doctrine associated with foreseeability and fault tests.

Definitional concerns aside, plaintiffs also may encounter evidentiary or informational challenges in prosecuting pattern or practice claims. It may be difficult for claimants—particularly low-income individuals—to obtain sufficient documentation of prior misconduct in order to satisfy pleading standards to establish a pattern or practice. These hurdles are present, of course, in current § 1983 municipal liability litigation as well, but should be partly ameliorated by more generous interpretations of the scope and number of preceding constitutional violations. Plaintiffs also may, of course avail themselves of § 14141-related reports and findings to support their own pattern or practice damages claims.

2. Lack of Policy Liability

Under the “lack of policy liability” provision, municipalities may be liable for damages for even single instances of officer misconduct when they lack generally accepted police department policies aimed at preventing the particular constitutional harm at issue. This section holds liable those police departments that do not meet the standards of most other police departments, thereby recognizing a constitutional duty to prevent certain police misconduct. In addition to securing compensation, this feature is the most likely to encourage departments to adopt nationally recognized, constitutional police policies and practices in order to avoid future liability.

The provision removes the high causation standard that proves so difficult for many plaintiffs to surmount when no appropriate policy is in effect. A lack of relevant policy thus amounts to what is a presumption of municipal liability. Though a municipality may demonstrate that the absence of a policy did not cause the plaintiff’s constitutional harm, that burden is on the municipal government, not the plaintiff. Plaintiffs may still obtain damages when police departments have implemented appropriate policies but will not benefit from the same favorable municipal liability standard of proof.

The notion of a constitutional duty to prevent police misconduct has not eluded judicial review. In Rizzo the Court rejected imposing a negligence standard, replete with a duty of care, on local government and police officials. The Court discounted the contention that government

---

224 Id. at 103-04 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting).
225 WASSERMAN, supra note 88, at 132-33.
226 Rachel Harmon notes in her criticism of proposals according private individuals power to bring equitable claims under § 14141 that they may interfere with, or even undermine, government initiated attempts at reform of the same police departments. Harmon, Promoting Civil Rights, supra note 103, at 60-62. A significant increase in damages claims concerning a department subject to structural reform investigation or oversight could raise some of these same concerns though the distinct forms of relief might render the critique largely inapposite.
227 See Cover, supra note 3, at 1836 (proposing that lack of constitutionally protective policies and training should establish municipal liability).
defendants had “a constitutional ‘duty’ . . . to ‘eliminate’ future police misconduct.”

The proposed standard accords, in part, however, with Justice Blackmun’s articulation of constitutional duty. Blackmun argued in his dissent in Rizzo for a more expansive reading of § 1983 liability as described in Monroe: Section 1983 “‘should be read against the background of tort liability that makes a man responsible for the natural consequences of his actions.”

Even without a specific policy ordering the constitutional violations, Blackmun insisted that “[t]here must be federal relief available against persistent deprival of federal constitutional rights.” As Blackmun explained, police officials may have a “duty” to prevent subordinate officer’s misconduct, rendering them liable under § 1983.

While Blackmun’s opinion directly supports a constitutional duty to prevent police misconduct when a pattern or practice of constitutional violations exists, his reasoning indirectly supports a constitutional duty where there is a general policy and practice to prevent particular constitutional violations. A national consensus on such policies reflects an informed belief that a police department must take specific steps and implement certain procedures to prevent constitutional violations by its officers.

Resort to a consensus of local police department practices to ascertain a constitutional standard or duty of care may be analogized to the medical malpractice national standard of care. Commentators justify the trend toward a national medical standard as preventing substandard medical treatment and ensuring quality care irrespective of diverse geographic locations.

Adopting such national standards of police treatment may be justified on similar grounds.

---

228 Rizzo, 423 U.S. at 376 (“Such reasoning . . . blurs accepted usages and meanings in the English language in a way which would be quite inconsistent with the words Congress chose in § 1983.” Notably, all of the cases that the Court addressed relating to a link between a pattern of misconduct involved pleas for injunctive relief. Id. at 373-77.

229 Id. at 384 (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (quoting Monroe, 365 U.S. at 187). Peter Schuck similarly argues that, in addressing municipal liability, the analysis would be better aimed at questions of duty—as to what and whom—rather than causation. Schuck, supra note 64, at 1765, 1766-72.

230 423 U.S. at 382 (Blackmun, J., dissenting). Blackmun would have held that a supervising official’s conscious permission of a subordinate’s constitutional violation could establish liability and lead to an equitable remedy, suggesting there was no legal difference between officials’ “active encouragement and direction of” and “mere acquiescence in” police misconduct. Id. at 385 n. 2 (quoting Schnell v. City of Chicago, 407 F.2d 1084, 1086 (7th Cir. 1969)).

231 Id. (quoting Schnell v. City of Chicago, 407 F.2d 1084, 1086 (7th Cir. 1969)).

232 JAMES A. HENDERSON JR., RICHARD N. PEARSON, & DOUGLAS A. KYSAR, THE TORTS PROCESS 213 (8TH ED. 2012) (citations omitted) (“The trend in recent years has been to depart from the ‘locality rule’ and to turn to the country as a whole to determine medical custom, at least with respect to specialists.”); Michelle Huckaby Lewis, John K. Gohagan, & Daniel J. Merenstein, The Locality Rule and the Physician’s Dilemma: Local Medical Practice vs the National Standard of Care, 297 JAMA 2633, 2634 (2007) (documenting that 29 states and District of Columbia follow a national standard of care).

233 Lewis at al., supra note 232, at 2636 (noting equal informational access for rural and urban doctors and that “persistence of [the locality] rule may serve to promote the practice of substandard medicine”). Compare HENDERSON JR. ET AL., supra note 232, at 214 (“The rejection of the locality rule is based on the assumption that the quality of medical care ought not vary with the geographical area in which the defendant practices.”) with id. (“But as laudable as this sentiment is, is tort law really an effective instrument to achieve this end?”).
3. Notice of Constitutional Right

The final section addresses the potential scenario that municipalities will escape damages liability where there is no pattern or practice of the constitutional harms at issue and the municipality has a policy in effect that meets the general standard. It may prove difficult for plaintiffs to establish municipal liability in these circumstances. The section therefore alters qualified immunity doctrine to hold that the local government’s applicable policy “clearly establishes” the constitutional prohibition on a certain action. As a result, individual officers who violate that policy, which is aimed at preventing the constitutional harm, may not claim they lack notice under that prong of the clearly established test and therefore merit immunity. The combination of the “Lack of Policy Liability” section and the instant provision’s restructuring of the law may incentivize municipalities to adopt constitutionally compliant policies and more appropriately fix blame for constitutional violations. Moreover, individual officers will not escape liability, ensuring accountability and compensation.

B. Potential Objections

1. Modesty

Critics may contend that the proposed statutory framework for enhanced municipal damages liability does not go far enough. Based on the revisionist account of municipal liability set forth here, a critic may rightly question why the remedy is not to overrule Monell and lift the ban on holding municipalities vicariously liable for the acts of their agents. Numerous members of the Supreme Courts and scholars have proposed just that.

The proposed framework may be defended against the “too-modest”-remedy on several grounds. First, the proposal is likely to cover much of the same conduct as would the doctrine of respondeat superior, thereby achieving much of the same compensatory objectives. Second, the delineations of liability in the proposed framework offer a level of precision that may enable a so-inclined government entity to better examine and diagnose its constitutional failings, including 234 See Cover, supra note 3, at 1824-30 (describing similar proposal).

235 This aspect of my proposal is similar to Brandon Garret and Seth Stoughton’s “safe harbor” proposal, which would eliminate municipal liability where a department “adopted sound policies” in exchange for “expanded municipal liability and a departure from City of Canton v. Harris, for patterns and practices of constitutional violations.” Brandon Garrett & Seth Stoughton, A Tactical Fourth Amendment, 103 VA. L. REV. 211, 301 (2017).
236 Of course, given the current state of indemnification practices, it is likely that municipalities will continue to pay for their officer’s constitutional wrongs. See Joanna C. Schwartz, Police Indemnification, 89 N.Y.U. L. REV. 885, 912-913 (2014) (finding local government pay for more than 99% of the costs connected with settlements and judgments arising from civil rights lawsuits against police officers).
237 See Board of the County Comm’rs, 520 U.S. at 431-32 (Breyer, J., dissenting); Karen M. Blum, Section 1983 Litigation: The Maze, the Mud, and the Madness, 23 WM. & MARY BILL RTS. J. 913, 962-63 (2015) (describing general consensus that the most critical improvement to § 1983 litigation would be to permit vicarious liability); Jon A. Newman, Here’s a Better Way to Punish the Police: Sue them for Money, WASH. POST, June 23, 2016, https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/heres-a-better-way-to-punish-the-police-sue-them-for-money/2016/06/23/c0608ad4-3959-11e6-9ced-d6005beac8b3_story.html (accessed July, 14, 2016) (proposing abolishing qualified immunity, adopting local government vicarious liability, and authorizing federal government to sue police on victim’s behalf).
certain causation questions.\textsuperscript{238} By contrast, a vicarious liability regime, which holds the government entity responsible for all agents’ misdeeds, complicates the introspective and reform-minded route that seeks to weed out systemic problems. The prospects of police department “self-help” through litigation, however, despite the proposal’s more detailed bases of liability, may be overstated.\textsuperscript{239}

Finally, the proposed framework’s more detailed bases for municipal liability in conjunction with its change to qualified immunity doctrine achieve a better balance in apportioning blameworthiness than does respondeat superior’s blunter assignment of entity responsibility. The proposed framework, notwithstanding a local government’s potential policy and contractual reasons for subsequently indemnifying its police officers, more fairly allocates responsibility to the wrongdoer, individual or entity, and may foster improved policies and practices.

2. Costs

More permissive liability standards for § 1983 monetary damages claims would doubtless significantly reduce local treasuries. A first response: that is precisely the point. Too many victims of police brutality do not receive damages for the abuse they suffer due to police department action and inaction. For too long courts have manipulated government immunity doctrines to favor concerns over federalism, costs, and over-deterrence over compensating wronged individuals. Taking the costs-savings rationale to its most extreme conclusion would not only deny compensation to deserving individuals but also erode public trust and deprive society of constitutional-rights-clarifying. If the number of police brutality cases stretches judicial resources and local funds, it is no answer to preclude damages awards.\textsuperscript{240} Rather, the solution is to diminish the underlying instances of police misconduct.

Second, while the primary purpose of the proposed framework is to ensure more compensation for police abuse victims, dramatically increased damages awards against municipalities and officers may achieve the elusive deterrent effect that also undergirds constitutional tort litigation. To the consternation of civil rights advocates—and as volumes of law reviews attest—§ 1983 litigation has not reduced police misconduct.\textsuperscript{241} A greater financial penalty \textsuperscript{239} Id. at 1082, 1096-97, 1098-1100 (addressing reasons police departments ignore potential insights from litigation).

\textsuperscript{240} See Bivens, 403 U.S. at 411 (Harlan, J., concurring) (“[W]hen we automatically close the courthouse door solely on this [judicial resources] basis, we implicitly express a value judgment on the comparative importance of classes of legally protected interests.”).

\textsuperscript{241} See Jeffries, Jr. & Rutherglen, \textit{supra} note 124, at 1400-06 (reviewing history of damages as constitutional remedy and suggesting that context and efficacy of damages should impact its propriety); id. at 1418 (“Whatever the causes, it seems clear that damages actions are not a generally effective remedy against abusive and excessive use of force by law enforcement.”); Schwartz, \textit{Who Can Police the Police?}, \textit{supra} note 14, at 453-54 (observing that damages “success may not create leverage over the involved law enforcement officers and agencies” in part because “municipal budgeting practices usually insulate police department budgets from feeling any financial consequences of lawsuit payouts.”).
might finally make local governments and their communities take notice and insist on internal police reform.

Moreover, the current state of police misconduct litigation already visits substantial costs on local governments. Section 14141 litigation requires that local governments expend hundreds of millions of dollars in reforms. While some research suggests that these costs may offset § 1983 litigation expenses by reducing police misconduct, an expansion of municipal liability could theoretically lead to locally-imposed reforms precluding the need for additional § 1983 lawsuits and § 14141 actions.

Finally, should damages in the aggregate prove intolerable, the proposed framework could incorporate a cap on financial awards. Several commenters have suggested that imposing a ceiling on monetary relief or categories of misconduct would realize the general objectives of widespread damages relief. By ensuring that all deserving victims receive some award—albeit potentially diminished—a damages cap also would realize the procedural justice and normative objectives of constitutional torts litigation.

3. Federalism

The proposed framework’s diminished municipal liability threshold will also rankle many concerned over federalism. Placing more local governments’ police departments before federal judges implicates federalism—but in the narrowest sense. As the revisionist account of municipal liability demonstrates, an increase in damages lawsuits should not arouse the protracted litigation and oversight concerns that animated the Supreme Court’s original invocations of federalism. And a possible cap on damages might further blunt these concerns.

In addition, as Fred Smith argues, local governments’ increased authority and power since the 1870s, along with a commensurate rise in common law accountability, support changes to constitutional tort accountability. The same federal-local power disparities and distinctive responsibilities are less pronounced today. Reducing municipal liability standards would fall within the logical and necessary progression of rising power and attendant liability.

The proposed framework’s “national standard,” however, may also raise its own issues concerning federalism and local autonomy. Federally imposing—even if only legislatively—a policy on all 18,000 police departments may offend some local policing interests. Softer legislative 243 Schuck, supra note 64, at 1785; Smith, supra note 1, at 482-83.

---

244 See, e.g., Black v. City of Memphis, 215 F.3d 1325, 2000 WL 687683 *3 (6th Cir. 2000) (unpublished) (“To apply a less stringent standard would cause municipal liability to collapse into respondent superior liability, thus raising serious federalism concerns.”).

245 Smith, supra note 1, at 485-87.
power may instead be exercised that conditions grant money to local government for police activities on their adopting federally-identified policies, training, and standards.\(^{246}\)

Yet the localized nature of policing is overstated. Most police departments face similar concerns regarding use of force, weapons training, patrol tactics, and the like.\(^{247}\) The need and virtue of diverse approaches can be accommodated while arriving, in most cases, at agreed-upon best police policies and practices.\(^{248}\) For example, a small, rural police department might not have reason to adopt the same policies followed by a large, metropolitan agency. In these circumstances, the local department could be permitted to “waive” out of that specific, national consensus policy.

Finally, some may criticize deriving a constitutional duty from various police department policies as a “tender-hearted desire to tortify the Fourteenth Amendment”, improperly expanding constitutional liability.\(^{249}\) Though this provision admittedly broadens constitutional liability, that the duty emerges from a consensus of local police forces should allay some federalism concerns.

The proposal bears some hallmarks of “new federalism”—the notion that “[s]tate constitutions, too, are a font of individual liberties, their protections often extending beyond those required by the Supreme Court’s interpretation of federal law.”\(^{250}\) Here, as well, agreement between numerous local police agencies could augment federal constitutional protections. Establishing a constitutional duty on police misconduct by consensus of local police departments is likely more representative, practical and manageable, and attuned to police and local interests than through courts’ current, infrequent judicial opining on constitutional standards, without regard to police department policies.

Ultimately, however, the Court’s worries over federalism in \textit{Monell} and thereafter are misplaced. And similar concerns elicited by this proposal are also off the mark. Critics’ brief should not be with the mechanisms that enforce government and official liability. Rather, as Third Circuit Judge John Gibbons explained, “The fourteenth amendment and the civil rights present the threat to local authority.”\(^{251}\) That is, the constitutional and statutory system are designed to limit \(^{246}\) See, e.g., H.R. 5221, “Preventing Tragedies Between Police and Communities Act of 2016” (proposing that local governments receiving grants under the Edward Byrne Memorial Justice Assistance Grant Program must train police officers in, and utilize de-escalation techniques).

\(^{247}\) See POLICE EXECUTIVE RESEARCH FORUM, DEFINING MOMENTS FOR POLICE CHIEFS 20 (Feb. 2017),
http://www.policeforum.org/assets/definingmoments.pdf (“One of the strengths of American policing is that we have so many diverse agencies. But there are some areas where we are not going to be able to maintain the luxury of agency-specific practices. This is one of them.”) (quoting COPS Office Director Ron Davis, addressing militarization of police).

\(^{248}\) See, e.g., POLICE EXECUTIVE RESEARCH FORUM, USE OF FORCE: TAKING POLICING TO A HIGHER STANDARD GUIDING PRINCIPLES (Jan. 29, 2016), http://www.policeforum.org/assets/30%20guiding%20principles.pdf. The report is based on “four national conferences; a survey of police agencies on their training of officers on force issues; field research in police agencies in the United Kingdom and here at home; and interviews of police trainers and other personnel at all ranks, as well as experts in mental health.” Id. at 1.

\(^{249}\) \textit{Kingsley v. Hendrickson}, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2479 (2015) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (quoting Daniels v. Williams, 474 U.S. 327, 332 (1986)). Also potentially problematic is that, for example, use of force policies are not often models of clarity, providing confusing or ambiguous guidance.

\(^{251}\) \textit{United States v. City of Philadelphia}, 644 F.2d at 223 (Gibbons, J., dissenting from order denying rehearing) state and local government action. Civil rights litigation, facilitated through appropriately permissive standards, “merely compounds, or perhaps makes good, that threat.”252

CONCLUSION

The Supreme Court long ago proclaimed that “[t]he very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury.”253 This article modestly proposes that Congress provide that civil rights protection to victims of police brutality by better facilitating compensatory damages through reducing municipal liability standards for damages claims and holding individual officers accountable for failing to comply with constitutionally protective police department policies. This approach will not vitiate the borders of local autonomy, but will bolster these communities’ constitutional limitations, and hold their governments, leaders, and officials accountable to the Nation’s laws.

It may be the rare case that a damages award sufficiently compensates a victim of police brutality. But where justice and accountability for unlawful police practices so often proves elusive, it is vital that a toll be properly levied. Without some civil remedy, the public will struggle to keep faith in “a government of laws.” Without some identification of wrongdoing and wrongdoer, the people will lose confidence in the protections of the Constitution.

252 Id.
253 Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 163, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803).