EDITORS' PREFACE

This issue of the Review presents a symposium of articles which are directed to current problems in the area of civil liberties. The authors who have contributed to this issue have achieved prominence in scholarly and professional circles. They bring insight to current constitutional problems which are of pressing interest to lawyers and laymen who are concerned with the advancement of personal freedoms.

The symposium is presented in cooperation with the American Civil Liberties Union and its Ohio Chapter, which are celebrating their fortieth and tenth anniversaries respectively. The Review wishes to thank these organizations for their support, and, in particular, expresses its gratitude to members of the Cleveland Chapter of the Union for their helpful efforts in establishing liaison between the contributors and the editors of this issue.
