EDITOR’S NOTE

As you flip, or more likely scroll, through the pages of this issue, you will notice that the Case Western Reserve Law Review has a new look. The Review has changed its design many times—the cover alone eight times since 1968—but there had been no significant update for the past eighteen years. Yet, over those same years, the way law reviews are distributed and read changed tremendously. With that in mind, the Volume 63 Executive Board set out to refresh the Review and make it better adapted to a digital world.

The new design incorporates aesthetic elements, but the primary goal was functional: to make the journal easier to read both in print and on screens. A few highlights of the design are

- a new typeface, designed by renowned computer scientist Donald Knuth, a 1960 graduate of Case Institute of Technology;
- the addition of more letter spacing to the footnote text to make it more legible; and
- improved running headers, which now display all important navigational information on one page.

These are but a few of the many changes. A comprehensive list of modifications can be found on our website at http://law.case.edu/journals/lawreview/. We welcome feedback. Please write to us at lawreview@case.edu.

Finally, we must thank and acknowledge our intrepid publisher, Robert Cheren, whose vision and dedication made this project possible.
