FOREWORD

To the Editors,
Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law

Dear Sirs:

As one who has had the opportunity for many years to work in the international law field, keeping up somewhat with what is being written and published in this area, may I indicate how gladly I welcome your new Journal. Those who are working in international legal studies, whether as practising lawyers, government (or international organization) officials, or as teachers both in law schools and in college departments of politics or international relations, will be glad to see and use this new publication. More and more good articles and comments are being written on various aspects of international law, for which there has not been room in previously established reviews devoted to international law, while their specialized nature has made them less suitable for general law reviews. Even more important, in many ways, will be the opportunity afforded by this new Journal for a larger number of students at your Law School to engage in research on international legal questions, and to publish their findings. The Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law will, I am sure, take its place with the international law journals recently established by other schools. I am confident that all of us look forward to its commencement of publication, and will continue to read it with interest and with profit.
